CHAP. I.

RETURN TO ENGLAND AND COMMENCEMENT OF ITINERANCY AND FIELD-PREACHING.

ON the 16th of September 1738, Mr Wefley returned to London; and began to exhort and preach, which he frequently did three or four times a day, at Newgate and in different parts of the city. He ftill retained his fellowship; but made feveral excursions into the country, and Vol. II. A with aftonishing rapidity, made a multitude of converts, and established focieties in different parts of the kingdom. The reproaches poured upon him from various quarters, and the reports eagerly circulated against him, seem to have had no other effect, than to stimulate his courage and inflame his zeal. Whether followed or despised, perfecuted or applauded, he never loss fight of his object, nor for a moment ceased to labour with the spirit of a Luther, and the gravity and authority of an apossile.

His own opinion of the undertaking in which he was engaged, was as great as that of his antagonifts was contemptuous. The appellation by which he conftantly diftinguishes it is, " the work of God;" and in one passage of his History of Methodism, he makes a digression, to inform the reader, that it is no " cant word." and means the " conversion of finners from fin to holinefs!" Innumerable passages in his writings shew, that he confidered himfelf and his brethren as instruments chosen of God for it's accomplifhment. We felect one from the last fermon in the fifth volume, where he speaks of his first labours in the methodiftic vineyard : "A few young, raw heads, faid the Bishop of London! what can they pretend to do? They pretended to be that in the hand of God, that a pen is in the hand of a man. They pretended, and do fo at this day, to do the work whereunto they are fent: to do just what the Lord pleafed. And if it be his pleafure to throw down the walls of Jericho, the ftrong holds of Satan, not by the engines of war, but by the blafts of rams' horns, who shall fay unto him, what dost thou?"

A 2

He confidered methodifm as a grand revival of religion; declares his altoniffment at Bengelius (who though he faid all the prophecies would incline him to fix it a century fooner, had ftated this revival as taking place in 1836, becaufe he knew of no remarkable work God had wrought on the earth between 1730 and 1740) and plainly affures the world, that he regarded it as the principal event preparatory to the glory of the latter days, and the conversion of all nations to the faith of Chrift.

Though prior to Mr Whitefield in the fociety infituted at Oxford, he feems to have been preceded by him in itinerancy and field preaching, as the latter entered upon his courfe during our miffionary's abfence in America. It is faid indeed that Mr Wefley had preached in the open air in 1735. On what occafion we know not; but it appears to have been purely accidental, and was difcontinued till 1738.

We have been the more particular in the relation of his conversion, his views of religion, and the circumstances preparatory to his entrance on public life, that the reader may form his own conclusions upon them, and be the better prepared to judge of the caufes of the oppofition he encountered, and his fubfequent fuccels. The former has often excited our indignation, though never our aftonishment. But we are not a little furprised to find, that feveral religious characters, and some even of his first and best friends at Oxford, thinking perhaps that he carried matters to too great lengths, turned their backs on him, and were ashamed to be feen with him in the ftreets. This was particularly the cafe with Mr Gam-

bold, one of the early methodist; afterwards, in connection with Zinzendorff; and we believe, a bishop among the " unitas fratrum." This gentleman was the author of a poem, called Religious Discourse, and of the tragedy of Ignatius. When Mr Wefley confulted him, with regard to his exercises for the degree of B. D. and particularly concerning the fubject of his fermon on the occafion, he told him it was of no fort of confequence; and that not a man in Oxford would mind one word he faid. Soon after, happening to meet him in the ftreet, Mr Gambold plainly told him, that he was ashamed of his company, and must be excused from going to the fociety with him. We need not fay, that he was piqued at this behaviour. " This, he observes, was plain dealing at least."

The exercises in question were not performed.

His original plan feems to have been to form an union of clergymen, and to profecute his projects by their ministry: but it was found impracticable. Whether they were prevented from joining him by the odium of methodism, or did not chuse to acknowledge him as their head (for we think he would have taken no equal or subordinate part) or whatever else was the cause, this scheme could never be accomplished.

A letter, written in 1742, is now before us, in which he wifnes for a clerical affiftant, were he only in deacon's orders; but adds, "I know none fuch, who is willing to caft in his lot with us. And I fcarce expect I fhall: becaufe I know how faft they are riveted in the fervice of the world and the devil, before they leave the univerfity." He was not much more fuccefsful among the clergy in the fubfequent, than in the first stages of itinerancy; and after several attempts by circular letters, and other means, perceiving the impossibility of the projected union, he faid, they were a mere "rope of fand," and finally left them to their own imaginations.

As he had little to expect from this quarter, his only refource was in lay preachers. The claffes and other meetings for prayer and exhortation, which were always extemporary, and where any one was permitted to make trial of his talents, was a nurfery exactly fuited to his purpofe; and foon furnished him with a variety of itinerants, of different characters and abilities. At first we believe his orthodoxy was staggered. But what was to be done? The "duris urgens in rebus egeftas" rendered it abfolutely neceffary, either to confine himfelf within the fphere of his own activity, and that of his brother, or to accept fuch coadjutors as fhould prefent themfelves. He determined upon the latter; and this decifion at once fixed him at the head of a fect; while his learning and abilities, with his academical and ecclefiaftical diftinctions, could not but raife him to a decided pre-eminence above his brethren of the itinerancy.

Hence we find, that when any difputes arofe concerning his power, he contended for it with all his might, and ever deemed it his inalienable prerogative. The people having formed themfelves into focieties under his direction, and the preachers being admitted with his confent, he confidered his authority equally abfolute and indifputable; and regarded, or profeffed to regard it, as the immediate gift of God. We ftop not now to enquire whether it was fo or not. But we beg leave to remind every man; who is in authority, civil or ecclefiaftical, that, whether that authority be of human or divine original; whether brought about by fome fortunate combination of circumstances, or acquired by the dexterity of it's possessor; it is, in either cafe, capable of abufe. We do not fcruple to fay, that Mr Wefley made too much use of his power. We call it by the foftest name; and, in the course of these memoirs, we may produce authorities to prove that he did fo.

As his mode of preaching had given general offence to the clergy, it will eafily be conceived, that his appointment of lay preachers would not leffen it. The queftion we are now confidering, is not the propriety or impropriety of fuch a defignation, but in what manner it would itrike the clergy. Such a violation of order was the natural occasion of infuperable prejudices. It feems to have been agreed, among people of almost all religions, that a learned education is at least a valuable prerequifite for the ministry: and decency feems to require that there shall be a folemn examination, and, in fome form or other, a public and authorifed ordination to the facred office. In Mr Wesley's plan, most of these requifites are wanting. That many of them were men of piety is unquestionable. But not a few of his preachers had received no adequate education. Some were as deficient in natural as in acquired abilities; and not one of them is ever examined or ordained in any form of ordination; those only excepted, to whom he gave ordination for Scotland and America, with two or three clergymen, who, to affift him, by reading prayers in London, had entered into the connection. When we fay that his preachers are not examined, we mean that their examination is inadequate, and nothing to the purpose; and that many of the questions proposed at the prefentation of the candidates, are a burlesque upon examinations. The want of a folemn form of ordination, which we remark as a capital defect, has been variously accounted for. Some fay, that it originated in the impollibility of procuring epifcopal, and the diflike he had to prefbyterian ordination. Others have imagined a lefs favourable reason; and recollecting that he often reminded his preachers of their having nothing to do with the character of gentlemen, are of opinion, that he was averfe to any form of ordination. left it should produce among them notions of equality; having fettled it as a principle, that there fhould be no gentleman in the connection but himfelf. But there is no end of conjecture. The reader will take which of these hypothefes he likes beft. We shall only obferve, that the admission of lay preachers was of course confidered by the clergy as an improvement upon his former eccentricities; and the doors of the churches, in most parts of the kingdom, as well as in the metropolis, were fhut against him.

Thus excluded from the churches, he was reduced to a kind of noceflity of preaching in houfes and in the fields; and being gradually reinforced by numerous auxiliaries, he prefently extended his labours and his fuccefs. Within a much shorter period than could be expected, he visited in perfon most parts of the kingdom; while his preachers were equally diligent in forming circuits, in which they included every place where they could procure a congregation : nor did they fail to collect them in many fituations, though at a great distance from the churches and other places of wor--fhip. As the people increased, fo did the itinerants; who in a few years establifhed focieties and erected meetinghouses in all the principal towns, and wherever the focieties became numerous-

Mr Wefley's first effay in field-preaching appears not to have been adventured without some deliberation; and it was finally determined upon, in confequence of the example set him, the day before, by Mr Whitefield, who had lately returned from America. It feems, it was fome time before he could reconcile himfelf to " this firange way :" but happening, or perhaps chusing, by way of preparation, to expound to his congregation at Briftol the fermon on the mount, which, he observes, is "one pretty remarkable precedent of field-preaching;" and being encouraged by the countenance of his old friend, he gave his fcruples to the winds, and took the field on an eminence, in the fuburbs of Briftol, on the 2d of April, 1739. A memorialist, in one of the magazines, who has made himfelf very merry at his expence, remarks, that this event will form "an epoch of fome confequence in the ecclefiaftical history of the eighteenth century."

It will hardly be expected, and it is indeed impoffible, if we would avoid end-lefs repetitions, that we fhould follow Mr Wesley through the track laid down in his Journals. We can only touch upon the principal events. From 1738 to 1747, he and his Brethren were employed in various parts of England; particularly in London, Briftol and Newcaftle upon Tyne, in Lincolnshire, Staffordshire and Cornwall; and among the colliers both at Kingfwood and in the north. In August, 1747, he went over to Dublin, where a fociety had been collected by a Mr Williams, who we believe was a clergyman, or at least officiated in that character. Confidering the immense number of papifts (who are not eafily profelyted) and the fierceness of their opposers, Mr Wesley and his fellow labourers were more fuccefsful than could have been expected. In 1790, they had erected meeting houles in every part of the kingdom; and had formed twenty-nine circuits, which employed fixty-feven itinerants, and a confiderable number of local preachers.

The methodists of this country have been long diftinguished among the mob, by the elegant term, swadlers. Mr Wefley feems to have been much pleafed with the character and behaviour of the Irifh, and agrees with every candid obferver of that polite and hospitable people, in giving them the just praise of their liberal and courteous manners. In those attentions which conftitute one great charm of civil fociety, and are peculiarly grateful to a ftranger, we know not whether they are equalled: they certainly are not exceeded by any people we have Mr Wesley has fomewhere known. observed, that he has seen as true courrtefy in an Irish cabin, as could have been B found at St. James's, or the Louvre-

It was not till April, 1751, that, in-. vited by an officer in quarters at Musselborough, he made his first tour into Scotland. In this town he preached once or twice; but made no ftay. In April 1753, he visited the north once more, and went immediately to Glafgow. Here, at Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Invernefs, and a few other places, focieties were at length established; but his fuccefs in Scotland, and in the other parts of the nation, bear no fort of proportion. In 1790, the number of circuits, north of Tweed, was no more than eight: which were fupplied by twenty itinerants. That of the people was equally inconfiderable. To the little fuccess of methodifin in Scotland, feveral things. might contribute: but we are inclined to afcribe it principally to three caufes;

the reverence they have for their own clergy, their extreme bigotry, and their invincible diflike to the methodiftic difcipline. Among a people fo attached to their ministers, he, who would fucceed in making profelytes, must be a man of extraordinary talents, or poffeffed of fome peculiar art of acquiring popularity. To the discipline introduced by Mr Wesley, our northern neighbours have ever discovered the most unqualified diflike. The mode of queflion and answer, in the meeting of the classes, by an unlucky combination, a member of the kirk inftantly affociates with the ceremony of auricular confession: nor can all the authority of the text quoted from St. James *, cancel the prejudice of this unfortunate affociation. As for the bigotry of the Scots, it is fo notorious, that nothing need be faid upon it. Another reafon that has been affigned, is the non-administration of baptifm and the Lord's fupper. But this, however plaufible in theory, is confuted by facts. Several of the preachers in Scotland have received prefbyterian ordination, and actually administer these ordinances; but we do not hear that this circumstance has had the influence that was expected.

The perfecution of the itinerants and their congregations has been mentioned. But it deferves a more particular attentention. They had proceeded not very far on their plan of reformation, when Mr Wefley's old doctrine came into practice, and he found, as his brother had predicted, "as much contempt as his heart could wifh." Methodifm, as chrifianity had been before, was the accidental cause of much evil. It produced a general ferment in the minds of men, and divided the nation into three parties; the converts to this new doctrine; the enemies and opposers of it; and the infidels, who quietly looked on, and enjoyted the fport.

A new religion, or any thing novel or peculiar in the promulgation or revival of a religion, whatever may be it's antiquity, is always productive of fome commotion. Whether it was, that the tenets of methodifm were too ftrict for the public tafte; whether their difcourfes were regarded as fatires upon mankind; or whether both these confiderations concurred with the aversion men naturally feel to inroad and innovation on established customs, we pretend not to determine.

Whatever was the cause, the effect was infamous. It was perfecution in all it's forms; fo far at least as perfecution can be carried in a protestant country. It differed from the popifh perfecutions in one only circumstance: it was notwarranted by government : It was not a perfecution by authority. But it afforded a melancholy proof, that protestants' can be almost as cruel as the catholics themfelves : and that whatever may be the more liberal temper of the candid and enlightened of mankind, the mob of all countries and of all religions is but too much the fame.

As Mr Wefley was at the head of the fect, the public attention was principally directed to him. To render him obnoxious to government, the fools or knaves of the day, who complimented administration, by supposing them as crazy and as favage as themfelves, took it into their heads to believe, or affect to believe, that he was an agent for the Pretender; not an Englishman, as he infisted, but a Frenchman and a Jefuit; who, from the opinion entertained of his fuperior talents, was employed by a neighbouring court, to pave the way for the Chevalier: and his converts were accufed of popery and - fedition. Almost in the fame breath, and with a confiftency, by which the great vulgar and the fmall has been eminently diftinguished, they fuddenly deposed him from his dignity. It was confidently reported, and as flupidly believed, that he had been fined for felling gin contrary to the statute; and, in a little time, this diflurber of nations, this fubverter of monarchies, was degraded into an ideot, a driveller, an illiterate enthufiast !

( 24 )

The manner in which he was taken." to task by feveral of his literary antagonists, does little honour either to their heads or their hearts. Most of them, if we may judge from their management of that controverfy, were weak and contemptible writers; and undertook to refute a man, who certainly was learned and ingenious, without giving themfelves the trouble to understand his doctrines. The confequence was, that their deficiency in argument, was supplied by invective. With difpolitions worthy of inquifitors, they studied, by slander and defamation, to inflame against him the refentments of the populace. Many of the magistrates copied their example. By refusing to take informations and to grant warrants, they encouraged the brutality of the rioters. Not content with denying the justice they had fworn to administer, they were repeatedly guilty of an avowal of their fatisfaction in the enormities of the mob.

The most furious riots were in Cornwall, Lincolnshire, Staffordshire, and Cork. Mr Eggington, the minister of Wednefbury, Mr Lane, of Bentley Hall, Mr Perschouse, of Walfal, and Mr Crone, the mayor of Cork, are particularly diftinguished by Mr Wesley for the implacability of their zeal. To their encouragement it is principally afcribed, that fuch outrages were committed, as are a f f candal to the christian name. The last of these told the mob in plain terms, that they might treat the methodifts as they pleafed, provided they did not kill them. This he feems to have fufpected was not firicity legal!

The tameness of Mr Wesley's friends, who had imbibed that filliest of all prin( 25 )

ciples, the doctrine of non-refiftance; increased the confidence of their adverfaries, and exposed them to injuries, which refiftance would have prevented. This however was not without exceptions. We know fome, who made it a point to refift the mob wherever they found them; and they did fo with great fuccefs. The rabble are for the molt part as pufillanimous as they are cruel; and there have been many inftances of a dozen refolute men driving two or three hundred of these ruffians before them, like a flock of fheep. Had they always acted in this manner, which, when the magistrates refused them justice, they certainly ought to have done, in a little time, not a man would have dared to diffurb them. Unfortunately, this spirit was confined to a few : and non-refiftance was a miferable expedient for difarming their perfecutors. The lefs they were opposed, the more infolent they became. The methodifts were in frequent danger of their lives. Men, women with child, and even children were knocked down and abufed with the fame favage, undistinguishing: fury. Houses were stripped of their farniture, vast quantities of goods carried off, feather-beds cut in pieces, and ftrewed over the ftreets; and, at the infligation of a wealthy villain, who headed a mob for that purpofe, one preaching-house was pulled down to the ground. Several réputable people were forced into the army. One in particular, a worthy and innocent man, was dragged away from his family, and marched to Newcaftle upon Tyne. Through abufe and fatigue, he fell ill of a fever. Being fent to the hospital, he was let blood; his arm mortified, and was cut off; and in two or three days he died.

Who, that deferves the name of a mancan fupprefs his indignation, when he reflects, that there is even a possibility of committing fuch barbarities; and that they have been fubmitted to in the eighteenth century, and in a land that boafts (in many refpects, juftly boafts) it's liberties, and looks down with confcious dignity on every other? But what is liberty, if it be not equal? Or who will fay, that this country is free, while the most useful people it contains are still subject to the most egregious tyranny, and a despot, in the commission of the peace, has it at any time in his power, to fatiate his refentment against a poor man, by fending him to the fleet or the army?

Of the conduct of the magistrates who encouraged these enormities, it is impossible to speak in equal terms of sewerity and indignation. Deeply is it to -be regretted, that fuch execrable wretches fhould have been obtruded on the magiftracy, and that a truft, fo important to the public tranquillity, was delegated to the impotent or defpotic hands of men, either shamefully ignorant of the laws of their country, and the first principles of natural justice; or what is still worfe, inhuman enough deliberately to break through them, and let loofe a fierce banditti on the perfons and property of their fellow subjects. A magistrate, who ac--quits himself with ability and impartiality, is a respectable and useful character: but if the reverse; if deficient either in knowledge or integrity, one or both of which was certainly the cafe of those, of whom we are now fpeaking, his fituation only renders that deficiency the more confpicuous. His advancement to sthe magistracy is his difgrace; and it happens to him, in common with many of the most flagitious, "tollitur in altum, ut majore ruat casu."

Mr Wefley, in " perpetuam rei memoriam," has recorded the names of feveral gentlemen of this ftamp, but many more are omitted. Were they claffed as they deferve, they would be ranked with the infamous band of inquifitors and affaffins. Had we an accurate lift, they fhould at leaft have figured in thefe pages as the enemies of mankind; the puny tyrants of their refpective diftricts; and, if this work lived, their defcendants, to the remoteft pofterity fhould have learnt the infamy of their progenitors.

The first check that was given to the infolence of the mob, was, if we mistake not, in London. Sir John Ganson, one of the Middlefex justices, waited on Mr Wesley, in the name of his brethren, with information, that they had orders from above, to do justice to him and his friends, whenever they should apply; his majesty being determined, that no man in his dominions should be perfecuted for confcience sake. Posterity will scarcely believe, that, in Britain, and at so late a period as 1742, justice was not to be had, but by an order from court! That such an order was issued, reflects infinite credit on the fovereign who commanded it.

The royal mandate was by no means premature. It was become abfolutely neceffary that fomething fhould be done, to quell the increasing tumults. Of this neceffity even the enemies of methodifin were made fensible. In Staffordshire the mob turned upon their employers, and threatened, unlefs they gave them mo( 32 )

ney, to ferve them as they had done the methodists! To such a pitch had their brutality arrived, that if they faw a ftranger, whole appearance they difliked, they immediately attacked him. A quaker happening to ride through Wednefbury, they fwore he was a preacher; pulled him off his horfe, dragged him to a coal-pit, and were with difficulty prevented from throwing him in. But this gentleman, not fo attached to his principles, as to refuse the protection of the laws, profecuted them at the affizes; and, from that time, the tumults in Staffordshire subfided.

After feveral years of injury and illtreatment, their patience exhaulted by opprefiion, and their refolution increafed by fome fuccefsful trials, they began, in every part of the nation, to be more peremptory in demanding redrefs. If they were difappointed at the quarter feffions; which was frequently the cafe, they traverfed and appealed to the upper courts: At the affizes they were often, at the King's Bench, almost constantly fuccessful. The miscreant, who has been taken notice of, as having headed a mob, to pull down a preaching-houfe in Lincolnshire, was possessed of confiderable property. To avoid the exaltation he deferved, he had made off for the continent, leaving instructions with his agent, to compromise with the plaintiffs as well as he could. They were more lenient than he had reafon to expect. The houfe was rebuilt at his expence; and he was too fortunate in faving his neck. Some other examples were not without their effect. It was understood by degrees, that the methodifts had a right to equal liberty with the refl of their fellow subjects, and Vol. II. C were determined to affert it. They were permitted, we regret to fay it, not without extreme reluctance on the part of many, who ought to have known better, to worship God in their own way: and at length, after infinite struggles, found peace in all their borders.

This fubject has been treated by proteftant, and even clerical writers, with an air of gaiety and fatisfaction, which we beg leave to fay, is a fufficient intimation of their own malignity. What fo much pleafes them in others, they would doubtlefs have rejoiced to help forward in perfon. Let them enjoy themfelves in their own way: and let thofe, who admire it, follow their example. It is a fpecies of complaifance we feel no difpofition to imitate; nor will we folicit any man's indulgence for having treated this defpicable bufinefs with a warmth we wifhed not to reftrain; which we never will reftrain, on fimilar occafions; and which, having imbibed from infancy the most cordial abhorrence of tyranny and tyrants, from the lowest retainer to authority, to the sceptered majesty of kings, we deem ever commendable, in the relation of such nefarious acts of cruelty and oppression *.

There is indeed a fort of excufe, and it is the only excufe that can be made for the gentlemen, who encouraged thefe proceedings. Some of the weaker methodifts were certainly guilty of improprieties. Their ignorant bluntnefs, their rude reproofs and indifcriminate cenfures, with the inexcufable freedom with which they dealt " damnation round the land," were not likely to be well reccived. Mr Wesley instances in one perfon, who had fo provoked the minister of Wednesbury, that "his former love was turned into hatred;" and owns that fimilar imprudences had been productive in other places of fimilar perfecution. But this, though it may be a palliation, is no defence of fo horrid an evil. If these people were in the wrong, it was the duty of their more enlightened neighbours to convince them by reason; or if that were impracticable, to leave them to time and reflection. Extravagance is not often of long duration. If the methodifts were miftaken in some of their opinions, they certainly, as a body, were equally remote from immorality and fedition: and as no people on earth interfered lefs with politics, neither the public nor individuals could have any thing to fear from them. If there was a degree of wildness and enthusiasm in their difcourfes, which was more prevalent in the beginning than it is now, there were other ways of proceeding, than by perfecution. Argument, perhaps a little dashed with ridicule, is not only a more christian, but a more effectual mode of conversion than fire and faggot : and he who first thought of dragooning men into orthodoxy, was as ignorant of human nature as of christianity. Had be been capable of reflection, it must have taught him better.

* Whoever wiftes for more accurate information, is referred to an account of the riots at Wednefbury, published by Mr Wesley.

" By force beaßs act, and are by force reftrain'd, The human mind by gentler means is gain'd; Thou can'ft not take what I refufe to yield, Nor reap the harveft, though thou fpoil'ft the field. PRIOR'S SOLOMON.

CHAP. II.

OF MRS WESLEY'S DEATH AND CHARACTER. Difference between the Brothers on the Doctrine of Assurance.

MRS WESLEY, who, after the decease of her husband, seems to have divided her time among her children, died at London in 1742, aged about seventy years. The two brothers, with feveral of the family, were present on this melancholy occasion. She died as she had lived, not according to her fon's expectation, in rapture and triumph, but what was quite as well, in great tranquility. Mr John Wesley read the burial fervice, and preached the funeral fermon; giving another proof, how little he regarded the customs of the world. At the head of her grave was set a plain stone, with an epitaph in verse, and an infeription, intimating that she was the youngest and last surviving daughter of Dr Samuel Annessey.

Mr Badcock has observed of this lady, that the was a perfon "of most uncommon abilities and great goodnefs." Could he have found words still more expresfive of the most distinguished worth, he had no reason to fear excess in favour of this incomparable woman. Every thing we have heard concerning her, exhibits her in a point of view equally amiable and respectable. She was remarkable for the exact order of her domestic æconomy, and still more for the fingular addrefs with which fhe managed her children. Her chief atttention was directed to an absolute subjection of their will; and this fhe attempted from the moment they were first capable of reflection.

Her account of the manner in which fhe conducted their education is particularly curious. " None of them were taught to read till five years old, except Kezzy, in whofe cafe I was over-ruled; and the was more years in learning than many of the reft had been months. The way of teaching was this: The day before a child began to learn, the house was fet in order, every one's work appointed them, and a charge given, that none fhould come into the room from nine till twelve, or from two till five, which you know were our fchool hours. One day was allowed the child, wherein to learn it's letters; and each of them did in that time, know all it's letters, great and fmall, except Molly and Nancy, who were a day and a half before they knew them perfectly; for which I then thought them dull; but fince I have obferved how long many children are inlearning the horn-book, I have changed my opinion. The reafon why I thought them fo then, was, becaufe the reft learned fo readily; and your brother Samuel, who was the first child I ever taught, learnt the alphabet in a few hours. He was five years old on the 10th of February: the next day he began to learn, and as foon as he knew the letters, began at the first chapter of Genefis. He was taught to fpell the first verse, then to read it over and over, till he could read it off hand, without any hefitation. So on to the fecond, till he took ten verses for a leffon, which he quickly did. Easter fell low that year, and by Whitfuntide be could read a chapter very well: for he read continually, and had fuch a prodigious memory, that I cannot remember ever to have told him the fame word twice. What was yet ftranger, any word he had learnt in his leffon, he knew wherever he faw it, either in his Bible or any other book, by which means he learnt very foon to read an Englifh author well.

"The fame method was obferved with them all. As foon as they knew the letters, they were put first to spell and read one line; then a verse; never leaving till perfect in their lesson, were it shorter or longer. So one or other continued reading at school time, without any intermission; and before we less school, each child read what he had learnt that morning; and ere we parted in the afternoon, what they had learnt that day. "Every one was kept close to their bufinels for the fix hours of fchool. And it is almost incredible, what a child may be taught in a quarter of a year, by a vigorous application, if it have but a tolerable capacity, and good health. Every one of these, Kezzy excepted, could read better in three months, than most women can, as long as they live."

The most remarkable circumstance in the character of this excellent lady is, that she, as well as her father and grandfather, her husband and three fons, was a teacher of mankind. During Mr Wesley's absence, not content with instructing and praying with her family, she read a fermon and the fervice of the church every Sunday with the neighbours; and frequently directed the devotions of several hundred people. For farther information on this subject, the reader is referred to the Journal from 1741 to 1743, where he will find a letter, relating the occasion on which the first began, and the reasons of her perfeverance in to extraordinary a conduct.

In the epitaph which he composed for her, Mr Wesley has intimated her acquiescence in his peculiar doctrines; or rather her experimental knowledge of their truth: while, on the other hand, an ingenious and learned writer, whom we have already mentioned as having given fome account of the family, has observed, that Mrs Wesley lived long enough to " deplore the extravagance of her fons." That at one time fhe did fo, is indifputable: and her opposition to their proceedings was excited by two confiderations; an idea that they were making "inpovations in the church," and her difgust at the relations she had heard, of affurances of the divine fayour, communicated to their converts in " dreams and visions," and a variety of extraordinary manifestations. In a letter now before us, fhe agrees with her fon Samuel, that "it is not the method of providence, to use extraordinary means to bring about that, for which ordinary means are sufficient." Hence she contends that "those dreams and visions" on which many laid fo great a strefs, were "not only vain and frivolous as to the matter of them, but also of dangerous confequence to the weaker fort of christians." As a specimen of her mode of reasoning on this fubject, and of her notions of the fcriptural affurance of falvation, we feleft the following extract. " The very end for which they pretend these new revelations are fent, feems to me one of the best arguments against the truth of them. As far as I can fee, they plead, that these visions, &c. are given to affure fome particular perfons of their adoption and falvation. But this end is abundantly provided for in the holy fcriptures, wherein the rules by which we must live here, and be judged hereafter, are fo plainly laid down, that he "that runs may read." 'Tis by thefe laws we fhould examine ourfelves; and as this is the way of God's appointment, we may hope for his direction and affistance in fuch examination. And if, upon a ferious review of our state, we find that, in the tenor of our lives, we have, or do now fincerely defire and endeavour to perform the conditions of the gospel covenant, required on our part, then we may difcern, that the Holy Spirit hath laid in our minds a good foundation of a ftrong, reasonable, and lively hope of God's mercy through Chrift. You have plainly proved, that the fcripture examples, and that text in Joel*, which they urge in their defence, will not anfwer their purpofe: fo that they are unfupported by any authority, human or divine; and the credit of their relations must therefore depend on their own fingle affirmation; which furely will not weigh much with the fober and judicious part of mankind."

This letter, which is dated March, 1738-9, was written when Mr Whitfield was collecting in these kingdoms for the orphan house in Georgia, and takes notice of an interview with him on this occasion. He told Mrs Wesley, that "there never was greater need of itinerant preachers; that the clergy were alleep; that her fons took much pains to reconcile diffenters to the communion of the church of England; and that Mr John Wefley had baptized five adult prefbyterians in one day." She conceived, from this interview, a favourable opinion of Mr Whitfield, and fays, "he feems a very good man, and one who truly defires the falvation of mankind. God grant, that the wildom of the ferpent may be joined to the innocence of the dove!"

Her fon Samuel thought lefs favourably of this gentleman, and was more vigorous in his opposition to his brothers. He intimates in his letters, that it was in vain for Mr Whitfield "to pretend that he was of the church of England, unlefs there were two; one fubordinate, the other opposite to the prefent ecclesiaftical establishment and authority: one within doors, the other without." And he remarks, that, with all his "profeffions of regard for the liturgy, he never once read it to his tatterdemailions on a common." The inftitution of the methodiftic æconomy, he regarded as a fchism actually formed; and their extemporary difcourses and expositions, as "inlets to all falfe doctrine, herefy, and fchilm." Of the " bands of fociety," he fays, they were fuch a fnare, as he was unwilling to believe, " even of Whitfield's wrongheadedness." He asks, whether " any man of fense or spirit will fuffer a domeffic to be engaged to relate every thing, without referve, to five or ten people, that concerns the perfon's confcience, how much foever it may concern the family; and particularly infifts, that "no married perfons ought to be D there, unless husband and wife be  $toge_{\pi}$  ther."

Exclusive of his aversion to every thing. that bordered upon enthusiafm, Mr Wefley received an additional impulse from a letter addreffed to him, in the name of a Mr Orchard of Stoke Abbey, whom we suppose to have been a clergyman. It is dated May 1739, and enumerates a variety of opinions, which he afcribes to Mr Westey and his followers. His professed defign in this letter was, to ftimulate his correspondent to combat a fystem, which he considered as equally dangerous and unfounded : and this he fuppofed might be attempted with the best prospect of fuccess by a "a brother of the dear but deluded man."

He urges him to the undertaking, by . reprefenting the great good he might do by this means to the caufe " of pure religion rnd true christianity," and the acknowledged ability of his brother, should he propagate such notions, "to inform, or rather, to infect others."

The "dangerous and extravagant tenets," to which he alludes, are, " that the mode of education, the order and diffinctions, the degrees, and even robes and habits of the univerfity, are antichriflian; that nothing is taught in it, but that wifdom and learning, which oppofes the power of God; that he who is born of God, is also taught of God, not in any limited fense, but so as to render the use of all natural means of no effect; that all human learning entirely difqualifies us for preaching the true gospel of Christ; that none have a right to preach, but fuch as are immediately called to it by the fpirit of God; that an established ministry is a mere invention of men; that our whole church, and all it's authority, is founded on, and fupported by a lie; and that all who receive a power of preaching from it, are in a flate of flavery and bondage, and must throw off all obedience: to it, before they can enjoy the freedom of the gospel."

That many of Mr Welley's converts did at that time fpeak in this extravagant manner, is more than probable. We have frequently heard from filly, enthufiastic people an affertion, and, in their way, a defence of each of these propofitions; and every one knows, that learning and fanaticifm have ever waged an inexpiable war. But a pretty general acquaintance with his opinions, authorizes us to fay, that with most of these absurdities, Mr Wesley is not chargeable. Whatever might be the tendency of his fystem, he never was individually an enemy to letters, nor to any branch of academic dignity and diffinction. His friend Mr Law thought he carried his love of learning to an undue length; and, on this principle, was pointedly fevere on what he called, his " babylonish address to the clergy." Nor can we allow, that he confidered "an established ministry as the mere invention of men; or the authority of the church of England as founded upon a lie." On the contrary, he has always avowed himfelf a friend to the church, making ufe of her liturgy, and conftantly regarding himself as one of her ministers. The validity of those pretentions will be confidered hereafter. Perhaps the only charge in this catalogue, that properly belongs to him, is that which reprefents him as afferting, that " none have a right to preach, but fuch as are immediately called to it by the fpirit of God." This was certainly one of his principles; and we believe, it is the uniform and invariable opinion of his people. His notion was, that the call to the miniftry is twofold; the external and the internal; the human and the divine. In the former he included early defignation for the miniftry, academic education, and epifcopal ordination. By the latter he underftood, a particular defire to be useful to mankind, accompanied by an inward perfuafion of a divine appointment to the minifterial office.

It is remarkable, that the writer of this letter, in his recapitulation of the fuppofed errors of Mr Wefley, takes no notice of the doctrine of the direct testimomony of the Holy Spirit, which was certainly, at that time, his most distinguishing doctrine. But his brother Samuel did not forget it, and in althost all his letters, bent his whole ftrength to the demolition of it. Mr Wefley's polition, which we give in his own words, is as follows: "The gospel promises, to all that are obedient to the divine call, the witnefs of God's fpirit with their fpirit, that they are the children of God. I am one of many witneffes of this matter of fact; that God does now make good this his promife daily; very frequently, during a representation (how made I know not, but not to the outward eye) of Chrift, either hanging on the crofs, or standing on the right hand of God : and this I know to be of God, because from that hour the perfon fo affected is a new creature, both as to his inward tempers and outward life. Old things are past away; and all things are become new." To prove this, he cites feveral inftances of D4 perfons, two of them great enemies to the doctrine in queftion, who fuddenly dropt down in inexpressible agonies, and in a little time rose up again, full of peace and joy.

Of his brother's mode of reafoning against this doctrine, we give the following additional specimen : "I argue against affurance (in your, or in any fense) as part of the golpel covenant, becaufe many are faved without it. You own, you cannot deny exempt cafes, which is giving up the difpute. You fay, "the crofs is ftrongly reprefented to the eye of the mind ! Do those words fignify, in plain English, to the fancy? Inward eyes, ears, and feelings are nothing to other people. I am heartily forry, fuch alloy should be found in fo much piety. May we judge of the tree by it's fruits? Such visions, I think, may be fairly deemed fallacious, only for being attended with a ridiculous effect.

"You yourfelf doubted at first, and examined about the extactes. The matter is therefore not as plain as " motion to a man walking." But I have my own reason, as well as you your own authority against the exceeding clearness of the divine interpolition there. Your followers ' fall into agonies.' I confess it. ' They are freed from pain, after you have prayed over them.' Granted. They fay, 'it is God's doing.' Dear brother, where is your ocular demonstration? Where indeed is the rational proof? Their living well afterwards may be a probable and fufficient argument that they believe themfelves; but it goes no further.

"I must ask a few more questions. Did these agitations ever begin during the use of any of the collects of the church? Or during the preaching of any fermon, that had been before preached within confecrated walls, without that effect? Or during the inculcating any other doctrine, befides that of your new birth? Were the main body of these agents or patients good fort of people before hand, or loose and immoral?"

In another letter, on the fame fubject, he fays, " I have many remarks to make on your letter; but do not care to fight in the dark, or run my head against a stone-wall. You need fear no controvers with me, unless you hold it worth while to remove these three doubts: first, whether will you own or disown in terms, the necessity of a fensible information from God of pardon? If you disown it, the matter is over, as to you. If you own it, then, secondly, whether you will not think me distracted, to op1 pofe you, with " the most infallibe of all proofs," inward feeling in yourfelf, and positive evidence in your friends, while I myfelf produce neither? Thirdly, whea ther you will release me from the horns of your dilemma, that I must ' either talk-without knowledge, like a fool; or against it, like a knave ?' I conceive neither part strikes. For a man may reasonably argue against what he never felt; and may honeftly deny what he has felt to be necessary to others. - 🖌 I am not out of my way, though encountering windmills."

Such were the debates on a fubject, in which the parties, though from oppofite principles, were deeply interested. Samuel was the more in earness, because he had no doubt, that to convince his brother, was to destroy herefy in the bud; while the latter was equally tenacious of his fystem, from a persuasion, that the cause he vindicated was that of genuine christianity. From this view of the controvers, the reader will find little difficulty in forming his conclusions. That the advocates for the direct witness will not be convinced by the objector's arguments, we can easily believe; but they must at least own, that they are fensible and ingenious: and some will think them conclusive.

This gentleman, independent of his diflike to his brother's principles, found another caufe of difapprobation, in his fears for his health. Mr John Wefley had entertained an idea, that he had not long to live. His brother intreats him to let him know his reafons for fuch a fuppofition; and adds, "I fhould be very angry with you, if you cared for it, thould you have broken your iron confitution already, as I was with the glorious Pafcal, for lofing his health, and living almost twenty years in pain."

In this place we may take notice of Mr. Welley's subsequent account of his mother and brother. In answer to Mr Bad. -cock's observation, that " she lived long enough to deplore the extravagance of her fons," he fays, " by vile milreprefentations the was deceived for a time. But fhe no fooner heard them fpeak for themfelves, than the was thoroughly convinced, they were in no delufion, but spoke " the words of truth and fobernels." She afterwards lived with me feveral years, and died rejoicing and praifing God." To the fame purpose is a paffage in the Journals, in which Mr Wefley fays, that both his mother and brother were at length of the fame judgment with himfelf. " On Monday, September 3d," 1739, I talked largely with my mother, who told me, that till a fhort time fince, fhe had fcarce heard fuch a thing mentioned as the * having forgiveness of fins. now, or having God's fpirit to bear witness with our spirit : much less did sheimagine that this was the common privilege of all believers. Therefore, faid. the, "I never durst ask it for myself. But two or three weeks ago, while my fon Hall was pronouncing these words, in delivering the cup to me, ' the blood of our Lord Jefus Christ, which was fhed for thee,' the words ftruck through my heart, and I knew God, for Chrift's fake, had forgiven me all my fins."

I asked, whether her father, Dr Annesley had not the fame faith; and whether she had not heard him preach it to others. She answered, he had it himself, and declared, a little before his death, that, for more than forty years, he had no darkness, no fear, no doubt at all of his being ' accepted in the beloved;' but that nevertheless, she did not rememberto have heard him preach, no, not once explicitly upon it: whence she supposed, he also looked upon it as the peculiar blessing of a few, not as promised, to all the people of God."

Nearly fimilar is his account of his brother Samuel. <sup>66</sup> On Wednefday, the 23d, we came to Tiverton. My poor fifter was forrowing, almost as one without hope. Yet we could not but rejoice at hearing, from one who had attended my brother in all his weaknefs, that feveral days before he went hence, God had given him a calm and full affurance of his interest in Christ. Oh! may every one, who oppofes it, be thus convinced, that this doctrine is of God!" On this information he immediately puts a confruction favourable to his own idea of the doctrine of affurance. But perhaps he advances too fuddenly to the conclufion. Mrs Welley's confidence in the divine mercy, from a particular imprefflion of those words in the communion fervice, does not necessarily suppose a direct revelation. Nor is it eafy to prove fuch a revelation to be in any cafe neceffary; much lefs in that of fuch excellent perfons as Dr Annefley and Mr Samuel Wesley. Piety fo unequivocal as theirs might derive, both from fcripture and reafon, an affurance of falvation amply fufficient to every purpose of life, without any fuch interpolition; and it is reasonable to conclude, that this alone was the

they professed : for Mrs Wefley, notwithflanding their former d'fputes on this fubject, does not appear, till interrogated by her fon, to have construed any thing fhe had observed in Dr Annesley, into a profession of this doctrine. The probability feems to be, that fhe recollected' fome expressions of the Doctor, which were fignificant, not of that direct certainty for which her fon contended, and which he supposed to be communicated by an immediate teftimony of the Holy Spirit, but of his "lively hope" in the divine mercy. It is not unlikely, that, during the long confinement of Mr Samuel Wesley in his last illness, fomething fimilar might have fallen from him, which his brother would naturally accommodate to his own fystem. This is at leaft the most probable fuppolition; nor does there appear any authority for E fuppoing, that he became a convert to the doctrine of the direct witnefs, or that his fentiments, in this inftance, had ever fuffered the fmalleft alteration.

It would be little confiftent with the duty we owe the public, were we to difmiss this fubject without some reflections. If enthusiasim be an evil less dangerous than impiety, it is yet an evil. Religion has no neceffary connexion with fuperflition: and it greatly becomes us to guard against it. In enquiries into the conduct of reformers, whether real or pretended, the first question is public utility. This is a praise which cannot be denied to Mr Wefley and his affociates. Their earliest effays in the itinerant field were certainly attended with the fpirit of reformation : and as their zeal was of no common character, their fuccels was in proportion. In this view, too much cannot be faid in their behalf: and who. ever shall take the trouble to explore the proper fources of information, will find that they have been fingularly fuccefsful in reclaiming multitudes of the most diffolute characters in the nation. It is therefore with the greater reluctance, that we find ourfelves obliged to cenfure, where in other respects fo much praise is due. But it is necessary to separate the chaff from the wheat. Such were the confusion, the ravings, the extactes, by which their ministry was diffinguished, that they ought to be noticed. They force themfelves on our attention. They provoke enquiry; and to examine is to condemn them.

What lefs then can be faid of them, than that they were abfurd, extravagant, and antichristian? The ministry of the apostles was not marked by such an influence. The discourses of Luther and Calvin, and the reft of that illustrious band, who, in this island or the continent, were most instrumental in promoting the reformation, were not difgraced by fuch extravagancies. It is remarkable too, that they were regarded by feveral of the first methodists with a jealous eye. Of this number was Mr Whitefield, who at first was by no means fatisfied concerning them, nor confidered them as the refult of a divine influence. Even Mr Wefley has acknowledged that in fome instances they were spurious. But he goes farther than most people will be difpofed to go with him; and fuppofes, that they were fometimes produced by a 1 diabolic agency, and with the express purpose of casting an odium on the work. in which he was engaged. The probable prefumption is, that in most instances they were purely natural; the mere mechanical effects of extraordinary fentiments, delivered in a most fingular and extraordinary manner. The fair face of truth was frequently deformed by extravagance and excefs. Nothing can be more decidedly incompatible, than the mild accents of the gofpel, and what has often been advanced under that name, by many of it's profeffors: and though not .acquainted with any of the primitive methodifts, the Mr Wefleys excepted, we have heard difcourfes, in which hell and damnation has been denounced with fuch frantic declamation, and in a stile fo horribly fulphureous, that our aftonish. ment could fcarcely have been excited by any confequences that might have enfued. In men of fense and learning, fuch exhibitions will feldom produce other fenfations, than pity or contempt : but their effects on weaker minds are inconcievable.

The following letter to Mr Wefley, written in 1739, by Mr Cennick, who left him, on account of a difference in opinion, and afterwards joined the moravians, is felected as a specimen : " On Monday evening, I was preaching at the fchool on the forgiveness of fins, when two perfons, who the night before, had laughed at others, cried out with a loud and bitter cry. So did many more, in a little time. Indeed, it feemed that the devil, and much of the powers of darknefs were come among us. My mouth was stopped, and my ears heard fcarce any thing, but fuch terrifying cries, as would have made any one's knees trem-Only judge. It was pitch dark; ble. it rained much; and the wind blew vehemently. Large flashes of lightning, and loud claps of thunder, mixt with the fcreams of frightened parents, and the exclamations of nine diftreffed fouls! The hurry and confusion caused hereby, cannot be expressed. The whole place feemed to me to refemble nothing but the habitation of apostate spirits; many raving up and down, crying, " the devil will have me! I am his fervant! I am damned! My fins can never be pardoned! I am gone for ever!" A young man, in fuch horrors, that feven or eight could not hold him, still roaring like a dragon, " ten thousand devils, millions, millions of devils are about me!" This continued three hours. One cried out, "that fearful thunder is raifed by the devil: in this ftorm he will bear me to hell." Some cried out with a hollow voice, "Mr Cennick! bring Mr Cennick." I came to all that defired me. They then fpurned with E 4

all their ftrength, grinding their teeth, and expreiling all the fury that heart can conceive. Indeed, their ftaring eyes and fwelling faces, fo amazed others, that they cried out almost as loud, as they that were tormented. I have visited feveral fince, who told me their fenses were taken away; but when I drew near, they faid they felt fresh rage, longing to tear the to pieces."

It is worth remarking, not without fome furprife at his fimplicity in the relation, that Mr Welley deferibes nearly fimilar effects from the publication of his most favourite doctrine, perfection'; and tells the world, that " the fudden and violent emotions of mind, whether of fear or forrow, of defire or joy, affected the whole frame; infomuch, that many trembled exceedingly; many fell to the ground; many were violently convulfed, perhaps all over; and many feemed to be in the agonies of death. And the far greater part, however otherwife affected, cried with a loud and bitter cry. So that, upon the whole, we may affirm, fuch a work of God as this has not been feen before in the three kingdoms."

This is not improbable. Such a work, in all it's circumflances, is not to be expected every day. But whatever becomes of the reft, agonies and convulfions are no fymptoms of it's divinity. Reafon will be cautious in afcribing them to fuch an agency. They are more properly traced to ignorance and imbecility: which is evident, as well from the character of the fubjects of them, as from the prefent fcarcity of fuch phœnomena. The followers of Mr Wefley, in the fame proportion that they have increafed in knowledge, have decreafed in enthusiasm. At present, no one drops to the ground under their difcourses. We are now feldom shocked with hearing of the "blood of Chrift running down men's arms or throats, or poured like warm water on their breast or heart: of their feeling as if run through with a fword, or preffed with a great weight, or choaking, or as if their whole infide was ready to be torn in pieces:" and not often with the strange indecency of fhouting in the time of divine fervice, or clapping the preacher's back, "for mere fatisfaction and joy of heart." In a word, rant and nonsense, possessions and exorcifms, with the whole train of modern miracles, are certainly much lefs frequent than they were; and though not abfolutely fled away, are gradually retiring before the manly decencies of rational and fcriptural religion. This is another confirmation of the opinion of almost every judicious observer, that these were tares that sprung up among the good feed; and every rational christian will concur with Mr Samuel Wesley in lamenting, that so base an alloy should be mingled with so much piety.

It has been faid that the agitations fo frequently and fo justly cenfured, were fometimes artificial. A parallel cafe, which we know to be authentic, affords more than a prefumption that they were fo. In a certain district in the north of Ireland, feveral congregations had adopted a cuftom, like the jumpers in Wales, of rocking from fide to fide in the time of preaching, and when they grew warm, of leaping and fhouting, till they might be heard to the diffance of a mile. One of their preachers refolved to abolifh fo ftupid a practice. The first or second time of his officiating in that neighbourhood, fearcely had he entered upon his discourse, when they began to shout. He immediately made a paufe, and told his audience that he had always underflood the intention of the ministry to be the instruction of the hearers; that they could not poffibly be instructed by what they could not hear, and that as it was not to be fuppofed he could out-lung them all, he would wait till they had done. As the hint was pretty broad, they comprehended it. Their vociferations ceafing, he refumed his fubject : and it is hoped that itinerancy has never fince been difgraced by these noify accompaniments. This sublime act of devotion they called rejoicing. The propriety of it they inferred from a verse in the Pfalms, "rejoice in the Lord O ye righteous," and from a paffage in one of the prophets, where in the figurative language of prophecy, the trees of the forest are repre- ' fented as " clapping their hands!

To an impartial obferver, it will appear not a little extraordinary, that Mr Wefley, who could cenfure the phrenzies of the Welsh enthusiast, should be so fhort fighted with regard to fimilar extravagancies among his own people; many of whom were as wild as the most fanatic of the former. Giving an account of these excesses, he informs us that at one of their public meetings, " fome of them leaped up many times, men and women, feveral feet from the ground. They clapped their hands with the utmost violence; they shook their heads; they difforted all their features; they threw their arms and legs to and fro, in all variety of postures. They fung, roared, shouted, screamed with all their

might; to the no finall terror of those that were near them. One gentlewoman told me, she had not been herself since, and did not know when she should. Mean time, the person of the house was delighted above measure, and faid "now the power of God is come indeed."

It is a ferious objection to these " figns and wonders," that they are unnecessary. Not a fingle good purpose are they calculated to answer. As this objection feemed to carry fome force, Mr Wefley has undertaken to answer it, by assigning the reafons why he fuppofed them to have been permitted. " Perhaps, fays he, it might be because of the hardness of our hearts, unready to receive any thing, unlefs we fee it with our eyes, and hear it with our ears, that God, in tender condescension to our weakness, suffered fo many outward figns of the very time when he wrought this inward change, to be continually feen and heard among us. But although they faw "figns" and wonders," for fo I must term them, yet many would not believe. They could not indeed deny the facts; but they could explain them away. Some faid, "thefe were formerly natural effects; the people fainted away only because of the heat and closeness of the rooms." Others were fure, " it was all a cheat. They might help it, if they would. Elfe, why were these things only in their private focieties? Why were they not done in the face of the fun?" To day our Lord answered for himself. For, while I was enforcing, " be still, and know that I am God," he began to make bare his arm, not in a close room, neither in private, but in the open air, and before more than two thousand witnesses. One and another and an other were firuck to the earth, exceedingly trembling at the prefence of his power. Others cried with a loud and bitter cry, " what muft we do to be faved ?" And in lefs than an hour, feven perfons, wholly unknown to me, till that time, were rejoicing and finging, and, with all their might, giving thanks to the God of their falvation."

That the fymptoms attending these conversions were not natural, but produced by a divine agency, he infers from the purity of their subfequent conduct; as we may learn from his observations in a letter to his brother. "That such a change was then wrought, appears from the whole tenor of their life, till then many ways wicked; from that time, holy, just, and good. I will shew you him that was a lion till then, and is now a lamb; him that was a drunkard, and is now exemplarily fober; the whoremonger that was, who now abhors the very garments spotted by the flesh. These are my living arguments for what I affert, that God does now, as aforetime, give remiffion of fins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost to us and our children: yea, and that always fuddenly, as far as I have known, and often in dreams and in the vitions of God."

'This mode of reafoning may poffibly find cafuist, who will deem it conclusive. To us it does not carry conviction. The fubsequent deportment of these converts may indeed establish their fincerity. It may prove, that they believed themfelves, and were perfuaded of the truth of their affertions, that all this was the effect of a divine influence; but it is no proof they were not deceived. Mr Wesley fays, that these things which gave fo much F offence, happened by the divine direction, in order, that the conversions of his hearers, being fo remarkably diftinguished by the circumstances which attended them, the public might be induced to acknowledge the finger of God. But how is this poffible? Can any man fuppofe, that the Almighty would fuffer his operations to be debased by such effects? Effects highly ridiculous in themfelves; and therefore calculated, not to answer the purpose of producing credit to the mission of the preachers, but to destroy that credit, by prepofferfing the public against them and their ministrations.

That this was the general tendency of these extravagancies, is too obvious to be disputed : and it is easy to conceive, that the idea of a divine influence exerting itself in so fingular a manner, can never be reconciled with the inconsistency of fuppoling him to countenance any thing that shall defeat his purposes, by raifing prejudices against a work, which is confidered as his own. It is readily granted, that these preachers were useful. But they were fo, not because of these extravagancies, but in spite of them. And we are under no fear of incurring the guilt of impiety, by confidering them as blots and deformities, and a terrible difcredit to the whole undertaking. If the Almighty has any work to accomplifh in the world, he can furely conduct it without fuch auxiliaries. That he has ever deigned to employ them, it is not eafy to believe.

It is a little extraordinary, that this whole bufinefs is directly contrary to Mr Wefley's remarks, on another occafion, when from that expression of our Saviour, "the kingdom of God cometh not by observation," he fays, " furely any one may perceive a conqueror rulhing through a nation, at the head of fifty or fixty thousand men!" And he thence justly concludes, that the noify, turbulent zeal of Mahomet and other impostors, could in fact have nothing to do with religion. The remark may be retorted. The extravagancies which attended the early ministrations of Mr Wesley and his brethren, are as much open to common observation, as the marches and flaughters, the ravages and delolations of those military apostles; and if there be any truth in analogy, or any justness in Mr Wefley's reafoning, it may be prefumed, on his own principles, that these things were antichristian.

As the animadverfions of Mr Samuel Wefley have been noticed, it will not be improper to prefent our readers with the fentiments of another of the family. This gentleman, whofe name was Whitelamb, was a pupil of Mr Wefley's at Oxford, and married one of his fifters. He had been particularly obliged by the kindnefs and generofity of his tutor; which he did not fail gratefully to acknowledge. But he could never embrace his religious opinions. And from feveral letters, written in the infancy of methodifm, it appears, that he was ftrangely affected by his language and behaviour. The following is a ftriking picture of his feelings, on hearing Mr Wesley preach at Epworth, on his father's tomb-stone, and of his views of methodifm in general. Mr Wefley had preached in the churchyard, becaufe the curate, who was under the greatest obligations to the family, had refused him the use of the church, and repelled him from the communion. This letter is dated June 11. 1742. We give it as it ftands in the Arminian Magazine.

" DEAR BROTHER,

"I faw you at Epworth, on Tuefday evening. Fain would I have fpoken to you, but that I am quite at a lofs how to addrefs or behave. Your way of thinking is fo extraordinary, that your prefence creates an awe, as if you were an inhabitant of another world.

"God grant you and your followers may always have entire liberty of confcience. Will you not allow others the fame? Indeed, I cannot think as you do, any more than I can help honouring and loving you.

"Dear Sir, will you credit me? I retain the higheft veneration and affection for you. The fight of you moves me ftrangely. My heart overflows with gratitude. I feel, in a higher degree, all that tendernefs and yearning of bowels, with which I am affected toward every branch of Mr Wefley's family. I cannot refrain from tears, when I reflect, this is the man who at Oxford was more than a father to me. This is he, whom I have there heard expound or difpute publicly, or preach at St. Mary's, with fuch applaufe: and oh! that I fhould ever add, whom I have lately heard preach at Epworth !

"Dear Sir, is it in my power to ferve or oblige you in any way? Glad I should be, that you would make use of me. God open all our eyes, and lead us into truth, whatever it be !"

This letter was followed, in September, by another to Mr Charles Wefley, from which we learn, that his old tutor having demanded his pulpit, Mr Whitelamb was much concerned at the offence he had given by acceding to the demand. On this occasion he again intimates his. difapprobation of their fentiments in very remarkable terms. "To be frank, I eannot but look upon your doctrines as of ill confequence; confequence, I fay; for take them nakedly in themfelves, and nothing feems more innocent, nay good and holy. Suppose we grant, that in you and the reft of the leaders, who are men of fense and difcernment, what is called the feal and testimony of the spirit is fomething real: yet I have great reafon to think, that, in the generality of your followers, it is merely the effect of a heated fancy."

It is faid, that this gentleman, during his refidence at Oxford, was of a ferious character and exemplary deportment: but Mr Wefley undertakes to invalidate his teftimony by obferving, it was no wonder he thought as he did; becaufe, "at that time, and for fome years after, he did not believe the chriftian revelation!"

CHAP. III.

PROGRESS OF METHODISM.

MONG the early theatres of Mr Wefley's ministrations, we have particularly diffinguithed Newcastle upon Tyne. In this part of the vineyard, where he refided feveral months, he was eminently fuccessful. He always regarded it with fingular affection; and has frequently faid, that was he to confine himfelf to one spot, it should be this.

It has been observed, that many of the converts of Mr Whitefield were from among the rich. Mr Wesley's fuccess lay chiefly among the poor. The same remark is made by himself. "Our Lord gives us the poor, wherever we go: Theyare our perquifite. Such a loving, dirtycompany you never faw with your eyes *. But by and by they shall be white as fnow." One reafon that has been affigned for this difference, is taken from the fuperior strictness of Mr Wesley's difcipline. It is generally underftood, that in Mr Whitefield's plan there was lefs austerity and restraint. Perhaps another reafon was, that he was a more popular preacher. The crouds that attended his difcourfes were innumerable : and feveral perfons of diffinction embracing his fystem, it is no wonder if many opulent people followed their example.

It has been already intimated, that the bias of education had early imprefied Mr Wesley (and the principle was much more powerful and uniform in his brother Charles) with a ftrong predilection for the clergy; which would naturally induce him to with for affiftants in holy It was from this principle, and orders. perhaps too from their former intimacy at Oxford, that he took fome pains to cement the union between Mr Whitefield and himself. Had they harmonized in opinion, a coalition might have taken place; but with their views, it was impoffible. The former was an advocate for particular, the latter for univerfal redemption; the one a flaunch predeftinarian, the other as refolute an arminian : and fuch was the effect of this diffinction, that they refolved finally to feparate; their converts mutually dividing under their respective leaders.

The first intimation of this is in the fecond journal. "A private letter, wrote to me by Mr Whitefield, having been printed without either his leave or mine, great numbers of copies were given to our people, both at the door and in the foundery itfelf. Having procured one of them, I related, after preaching, the naked fact to the congregation, and told them, I will do juft what I believe Mr Whitefield would, were he here himfelf. Upon which I tore it in pieces before them all. Every one, who had received it, did the fame; fo that in two minutes there was not a whole copy left. Ah! poor Ahithophel!

" Ibi omnis effusus labor !"

What was the purport of this letter, we are not informed: but this facrifice at the altar of peace could not detain the gentle goddefs. The expedient, however ingenious, did not fucceed. A truce proclaimed by only one of the parties, ( 94 )

was not likely to be of long duration; and hostilities prefently recommenced. He tells us, that, having heard much of Mr Whitefield's unkind behaviour fince his return from Georgia, he went to hear what he had to fay. The refult was, that his old friend, who confidered Mr Wefley and himself as preaching "two different gospels," was determined, not only not to give him the right hand of fellowship, but publicly to preach against him, wherever he preached at all. In a little time, his warmth in fome measure fubfided. They were once more on tolerable terms of intimacy and friendship, and mutually occupied each other's pulpits. But many of their followers were less moderate. Confidering their extraordinary professions of religion, the zeal of neither party was fo tolerant as it might have been; and as the people generally improve upon the diffentions of their leaders, their difference in opinion was productive of a reciprocal and general opposition. Some exceptions there certainly were. I'he wife and good of all parties will always reject the abfurdities of their brethren. But as these are ufually the smallest number, their moderate and prudent counfels are generally rejected by the majority, and themselves treated as lukewarm and pussilanimous, or treacherous and difaffected.

This feparation was certainly not agreeable to Mr Welley; though it feems to have been inevitable, as well on other accounts, as from their difference in principle. Even good men are not always exempt from the thirft of popular applaufe. Perhaps each grafped at the fceptre: and as the love of fway is in many inftances congenial to the human mind, it is not impossible, that the contention between them might be as much promoted by the charms of power, as by the love of truth :

" Nec Cæfar ferre priorem, " Pompeiusve parem potuit."_____

Though this contention might have a tendency to weaken, it does not appear to have eradicated in Mr Wefley his efteem for Mr Whitefield. He entertained the highest opinion of his character, and constantly spoke of him in terms infinitely more respectful, than of any other of his antagonists, especially his former friends, the moravians. These he treated with as little ceremony as they feem to have treated him, and alternately attacked them with the feriousness of argument and the poignancy of ridicule. An infance which he gives of the pulpit flile of one of the public brethren is curious;

who, addreffing his hearers on the infancy of Chrift, supposes that his mother might fend him for a porringer of milk, which unfortunately breaking on the way, he might work a miracle to replace it! A stile equally simple and familiar! But whether this arose from the genius of the preacher, or from an amiable condescension to the capacity of his hearers, is not yet determined.

His opposition to the brethren has been afcribed to different caufes. Some have imputed it to jealoufy, and the pride of emulation; obferving that "enthusiafm diflikes rivalfhip as much as any other species of human pride;" and have concluded, that the eagerness with which he purfued the German Boar *, proceeded folely from the dread of his fuccess. This expression of his brother, which certainly is not the most polite, can scarcely be excused, except indeed upon the principle of poetic licence! One of his biographers fuppofes it to be applied to the Count, and to have been occasioned by the " little fuccefs with which they had hunted him." Perhaps it was intended, not individually, but for the fociety at large; and the poet might deem it sufficiently authorised, from similar applications in the metaphorical phrafeology of scripture. But we pretend not to defend fuch language. It is certainly too coarse for modern usage; and we observe, that Mr Wesley himself fometimes offends in this respect; and, forgetting his usual felf command, breaks forth into a strain of violent invective against a class of religionists, whom he characterises as the "fierce, unclean, brutish, blasphemous antinomians." A stile not the most genteel, and perhaps too harsh for any community, among whom there might be many individuals, whose practice was superior to their principles.

It is not improbable, that his zeal against the Count's followers might receive an additional impulse from their influence on his brother Hall, whom he confiders, in a letter to his fifter, as having been seduced by " those men, whose words are fmoother than oil;" and of whom he indignantly adds, " they have blunderingly taught him to find fault even with my acconomy and outward management, both of my family and fo-Whereas I know this is the peciety. culiar talent which God has given me; wherein, by his grace, I am not behind the very chiefest of them." But he has affigned other reasons for his strictures: among which we diffinguish the licentious tendency of fome of the doctrines which many of them inculcated, and their fervile obedience to their patron. Of the former, feveral specimens, which he has cited from their writings and their discourses, are miserable indeed: and many extracts have been made from their hymn books, which, for nonsense and ribaldry, are certainly without a parallel. The last of the charges he exhibits, however well founded, does not come quite fo well from Mr Wellcy. In this cafe,

" Clodius accusat meechos, Catilina Cethegum !"

The noble religionist certainly felt all his confequence, and was passionately fond of power; but not more fo than his antagonist. As no man was ever more enamoured of it than Mr Wesley, ( 101 )

nor ever contended for authority more abfolute and unreffrained, one would think he might have treated his brother fovereign with a little more lenity, and have found fome excufe at leaft for this "glorious fault of angels and of gods."

Among other reasons, it has been faid, that he frequently drew his quill against the moravians and others, from a natural inclination for controverly, and a peculiar confciousness of his dexterity in debate. In early youth he was undoubtedly pleafed with his polemical talents. Something of this lie has intimated himfelf: "When I was about twenty years old, my father faid to me one day, young man, you are now full of logic and philofophy; and you will difpute with any man that contradicts you, about any thing or nothing. But take my word, if you live twenty years longer, you will love controverfy as little as I do." He adds, that at that time, which was in 1743, he found it fo. . It is but candid to acknowledge, that his difputes with the brethren might poffibly have originated in better motives: nor is thereany proof that they did not. We find him fpeaking of the Count in a letter to a friend, in a stile of folemnity, mixed with indignation, which feems to have taken it's rife from higher principles than vanity or emulation. " I have no defire, fays he, to fee Count Zinzendorf any more, till I fee him before the judge of all, whole law I think he has defpifed, and caft his throne down to the ground." How different his address to Mr Whitefield! " Surely there shall be peace between me and thee, and between my people and thy people. But if Jezebel ask of me peace, I reply, what peace, while thy witchcrafts and thy whoredoms are fo many? Thou perverteft the right ways of the Lord. Thou ftrangleft all other children in the birth, and idolizeft thine own. Thou propheficft fmooth things to the rich, bewitching them with thy fyren fong. Thou art departed from the Lord! Beware he do not finally depart from thee. I do therefore, and muft interfere with the moravian plan, till I make peace with the world and the devil."

It may not be improper here to prefent our readers with an inftance of his mode of reafoning on controverted points, at this early period. In a letter to a friend, he thus remarks on the doctrines taught by fome of his brethren. "The love of God to all mankind, except thofe who finally caft away his offered mercy, I find fo fully and ftrongly " revealed in fcripture, that I cannot deny it, without denying all revelation: fo ftrongly, that in very deed, I fhould as foon deny original fin, and turn Pelagiam, yea Jew, Turk, or Pagan, as allow one foul to come into the world, whom God reprobated, or paft by, from eternity.

"I believe 'all men' means all men, and nothing lefs. All forts of men, no more comes up to it's meaning, than all forts of ftones. Saving grace is plainly grace, faving in it's own nature, yet not irrefiftibly fo. In which I can fee no inconfiftency at all. Neither would you, unlefs you had fo affociated the ideas of faving and irrefiftible grace. Hence, you can fee no difference between faving, and neceffarily or infallibly faving. My brother and I do believe, from the bottom of our hearts, that if all the errors of popery, mahometanifm, and paganifm could be put into one, it would fall fhort both of the big abfurdity and grofs blafphemy of unconditional reprobation I will neither take univerfal redemption, and univerfal falvation, nor leave both. I can fee a way between them, if you cannot; which is, univerfal redemption, and conditional falvation. This I muft believe, while I believe the Bible."

From this quotation, a fufficient reafon may be deduced, why a lafting union between Mr Wefley and Mr Whitefield muft have been impracticable. The gulph between them was immenfe: and it unfortunately happened, that those extreme points, in which they differed, were confidered by each as of the utmost importance, and elasted with the principal doctrines of christianity. If absolute predestination was absurdity and blasphemy, in the estimation of the former, the contrary doctrine would be regarded by him as equally amiable and important: and if, in the opinion of the latter, his own fystem was the true summary of christian doctrine, he could fcarcely coalesce with a man who so deeidedly opposed it.

The difference with Mr Whitefield feems to have given him more concern than any other that occurred. But he was not to be hurt in any great degree by any thing. His high conception of the work in which he was engaged, regarding it as the occasion of a reformation, which, beginning with the church, should extend through all orders of men, bore him up above every difficulty, and carried him through every opposition. "My belief, fays he, is, that the prefent defign of God is, to visit the poor, ( 107 )

defolate church of England; and that therefore, neither poor deluded Mr Gambold, nor any who leave it, will profper. O pray for the peace of Jerufalem. They fhall profper, that love thee. Whoever is any enemy to the church of England, is an enemy to God; nor can fuch have any place with us !"

Mr Wefley was always remarked as a rigid difciplinarian; and had he taken a military turn, would certainly have been diftinguished as a most punctilious martinet. A strict and circumstantial œconomy was congenial to his disposition. If it was a little complicated, fo much the better; and it is not improbable that he might have learnt it, in fome degree, from his father, who was a man of great regularity, and of whom he observes, that it was his custom to visit all his parishioners, fick or well, from house to houfe; to talk with them on the things of God, and obferve feverally the flate of their fouls. What he then observed, he minuted down in a book kept for that purpofe, which he called his Notitia Parachialis. In this manner he went thro' his parish, which was near three miles. long, three times. He was visiting it, the fourth time round, when he fell into his last fickness. This example, which was certainly a good one, he frenuoufly recommended to his preachers, and asmuch as possible, observed himself. He much admired a faying of one of the ancients; the "foul and body make a man; fpirit and discipline a christian." The maxim is doubtless just; nor will any reasonable person object to discipline, as well in christian as in other societies. fo far as it is uleful and necessary. But of this in the lequel.

About the year 1743, he was engaged in building a meeting houfe, at Newcaftle, a clumfy, ponderous pile, which was called the Orphan-house, though the defignation, or at least the use to which it has been fince put, bears no relation to it's name. During it's crection, which was defrayed like his other houses, by voluntary contribution, he was frequently at a loss for cash; to provide which, was his office. " In me, fays he, domus inclinata recumbit;" and he observes, that he must have been long ago at a full ftop, were it not for the reputation of his great riches; which however was a vulgar error.

Speaking of the difficulties he found in carrying his purpose of building, at Newcastle, into execution, he fays, "we can get no ground for love or money. I like this well. It is a good fign. If the devil can hinder us, he fhall." When this difficulty was removed, and the ground purchafed, he was for fome time as much at a lofs to get poffeffion : on which occafion he wrote the following, which is prefented to the reader as being ftrongly characteriftic of the writer, and a remarkable fpecimen of the laconic.

"Sir,

'n,

"I am furprized. You give it under your hand, that you will put me into poffeffion of a piece of ground, fpecified in an article between us, in fifteen days time. Three months are paffed, and that article is not fulfilled. And now you fay, you can't conceive what I mean by troubling you. I mean to have that article fulfilled. I think my meaning is very plain. I am, Sir,

> Your humble fervant, JOHN WESLEY.

In August 1744, he preached for the last time, before the University of Oxford. The freedom with which, in one of his fermons, he had charged that refpectable body with a crime of no common fize, giving general offence, it was determined by the Vice Chancellor and the heads of houses, to provide him a fubftitute at their own expence : which they continued to do, till his marriage, when he wrote them, in the apostolic stile, the following letter of refignation, dated June 1. 1751: "Ego Johannes Wesley, Collegii Lincolniensis in Academiâ Oxoniensi socius, quicquid mihi juris est in prædictâ focietate, ejufdem rectori et fociis sponte ac liberè resigno; illis univerfis et fingulis perpetuam pacem ac omnimodam in Christo felicitatem exoptans." On the refolution of the univerfity, he remarks, that he was well pleafed his difinition from the pulpit at St. Mary's fhould be on St. Bartholomew's day, the fame "on which, in the laft century, near two thousand burning and fhining lights were put out at once." It was about this time, that his brother Hall was rapidly finking into antinomianism, and imbibing those licentious principles, which impressed fo fatal an influence on his subsequent conduct.

An undertaking of no fmall magnitude, which he completed in 1748, and which certainly required a confiderable proportion of refolution and refource, was the inflitution of Kingfwood fchool. It's first intention feems to have been in favour of the children of the colliers; but that fcheme was foon laid afide, and it was appropriated to the education of a certain number of the children of methodists, who were to pay for their board, ( 113 ) and a proportion of the children of the travelling preachers, who were inftructed gratis. The number at prefent is about fixty. Adjoining to the fchool, was a chapel, which his brother Samuel wifhed him to have confecrated, and fubject to epifcopal jurifdiction. But here, as ufual, they differed; and with all his reverence for lawn fleeves, he chofe rather to be the bifhop himfelf.

The rules of the fchool, which are in print, difcover a large mixture of fingularity and good fenfe. The general plan of education is well calculated to give the pupils a good fhare of claffical learning. Moft of the claffics, for obvious reafons, he extracted. He permitted no translation whatever; and his grammars, which are very concife, are in English. The order in which the higher books are read, is much the fame as in other fchools; but in the first class, instead of Cordery or Eutropius, he introduced a book of his own composition, entitled, Prælectiones Pueriles, and written in easy, yet not inelegant Latin. The fecond class read Kempis and Erasmus.

Pope's obfervation*, concerning forms of government, may be applied with great propriety to Kingfwood fchool. Had it been ably governed, it must have been much more extensively useful. As the income is almost nothing, it may be prefumed, that men of learning would either feldom appear there, or foon withdraw from this land of famine. The truth is, and it is a fad defect, that few of the masters have been fcholars. A profession of extraordinary piety, and a little dexterity and manœvure, have introduced men into the pædagogal chair, who were fo far from being familiar with the learned languages, that they did not half understand English. Those who ought to have been teachers, were fometimes pupils to the boys. When they had acquired a tolerable fhare of learning, they prudently fet out upon their adventures; and the confequence, which was a perpetual fucceffion of masters, could fcarcely be favourable to the character of the fchool, or to the progress of it's pupils. Some, it must be granted, were of a different character. We have known feveral, who were men of learning and information; and the gentleman who now prefides there, is certainly fuperior to most of his predecessors.

There are fome errors in this inflitution, which to mention, is to condemn. It is a rule, that the boys fhall rife at four. They are not permitted to play, on any confideration; becaufe, as Mr Wefley fays, " he that plays while he is a boy, will play when he is a man:" and the frequent returns of prayers, and fermons, and exhortations, are fuch, as . to give, not a tafte of religion, but a loathing. Each of these carries abfurdity upon the face of it. What shall a boy do, shivering in the cold, from four till eight in a winter's morning? It is true, he may hear prayers and fing hymns; but we will venture to fay, he will be fo heartily fick of both, that they will fcarcely do him much good! The rule concerning play is, if possible, still more unreasonable than the former. Every one knows, that much, and even violent exercise is necessary for boys. They have, in all ages, been indulged in youthful sports and recreations, from the courtly and elegant Horace; to the most illustrious of modern names : and yet, it did not prevent their future eminence! Of the ftrictness of confinement, and the frequency of religious exercises, it is fufficient to obferve, that experience has clearly decided against them. Nature will brook nothing violently contrary to her dictates: and the confequence has been, that most of the boys. who were educated at this fchool, were no fooner at liberty from the reftraints of fo rude a discipline, than they eagerly plunged into almost every excess, and took large draughts of the cup of pleafure. It remains only to observe, that the fchool is fupported partly by those parents who can pay for the education of their children, and partly by annual collections, which amounted in 1790 to upwards of gool.

H 3

In the early stages of itinerancy, Mr Wesley's fentiments fuffered a variety of revolutions, or at least of progressions, and fometimes led him to take notice, both from the pulpit and the prefs, of feveral things, which might well have been spared. A discourse on tea, or a learned lecture on the importance and fuperior advantages of celibacy, will fcarcely ftrike the mind as the moft proper subjects of clerical discussion, or as having any neceffary connexion with our religious concerns. As for the first of thefe, there feems to be but one point of view in which it is worth notice, and in that view, it belongs, not to theology, but to medicine. Of the latter, every one must judge for himfelf. An apostle might furely recommend a fingle life, in times of danger and general perplexity, without ever intending it to be eftablish-

ed as a standing rule. Our Saviour's reflections on this fubject, as well as those of St. Paul, feem merely applicable to a particular feafon. And though Mr Wefley infifts, that "celibacy is the more excellent way," and that St. Paul has laid down fuch advantages of it, " as are by no means confined to a state of perfecution," we beg leave to doubt the truth of a polition, which, if generally admitted, would tend to the destruction of fociety, and is directly levelled against the unalterable laws of nature, and a politive command of it's great author. To combat thefe, is to be at war with reafon. The doctrine he fo zealoufly inculcated, is not only unferiptural, but dangerous. It may well enough comport with the papal fuperflition; but protestantism must ever abhor so chimerical a fystem. Among those fects, who have most favoured it, the purity they pretended to induce, by an opposition to the law of nature, was in fact never attained; and they frequently fell into vices, which were the natural confequence of fo abfurd a principle.

It is hard to fay, from what quarter Mr Wesley derived his notions of celibacy; whether from the faints of the Roman calendar, or from the fingle brotherhood at Hernhuth. It is enough that he did imbibe them; and that feveral followed his example. It is not a little remarkable, that in the infancy of methodifm, his brother Hall should have fallen into the fame dream; and that a man, to whom, in the fequel, twenty wives had fcarcely feemed fufficient, fhould strangely take it into his head, that he had received the gift of continence, and was called to be "an eunuch for the kingdom of heaven!"

It is ridiculous enough, to observe the use that was frequently made of this fentiment. Several young women in Mr Wefley's connexion were imprefied with fimilar fingularities. They took it into their heads, that they were facred, devoted things, and not to be profaned by approximation to the other fex. Inftead of marrying and guiding the house, as an apostle exhorts the younger women, they were to ferve God in an immaculate folitude; to be feparate from the world, and to guard the veftal fire! Things of this nature, certainly carry no promifing afpect. They are at least whimfical, if they be not fomething worfe; and were productive of much ridicule and difgust. Whoever was prejudiced against Mr Wesley, and reprobated his general plan, would not fail to embrace the occafion, to form a variety of conjectures on his adoption of fuch principles, and to point a thousand farcafins at his whole fystem. And this was actually the cafe. Some of his religious antagonifts took. the liberty to demand, what could have induced him, with fuch fentiments and professions, to marry: to which he bluntly replied, "for reasons best known to myfelf !" Others went ftill farther, and infifted, that he must have had fome finifter views, in the recommendation of the fingle state. Charity would induce us to hope, this was not true; and that his peculiar views of religion were the only motives by which he was influenced. Indeed the goodness of his intentions is more than probable: it is indifputable. We are only forry, that he gave any occasion to his enemies to think other.

wife. By a fimilar error, an improperaccommodation of a particular rule to general use, he had formed a perfuasion, that christians of a particular standard fhould imitate the first church at Jerusalem, and have all things in common; and he accounts for the religious deficiencies of fome of his people, by faying, " these believers did not take the word of God for their rule. They had not all things in common. I can't fee how believers can continue fuch, if they are not willing at least to have all things in common." And for fome time, he was ferioufly in doubt, whether he ought not to put them to the teft !

With Mr Wefley's ideas of celibacy, it is no wonder that, for fome years, he oppofed the matrimonial engagements of his preachers, and on this account threatened fome of them with expulsion.

But his own marriage, which has been mentioned as having taken place in 1751, introduced a different fystem, and was equally matter of offence to fome, and of altonishment to others. Of the lady's family we have little information. But the connexion was unfortunate. There never was a more preposterous union. And though it is pretty certain that no loves lighted their torches on this occasion, it is as much to be prefumed, that neither did Plutus prefide at the folemnity. Mrs Wefley's property was too inconfiderable, to warrant the fuppofition of one of his biographers, that it was a match of interest. Had she been ever fo rich, it was nothing to him; for every shilling of her fortune remained at her own difpofal : and neither the years, nor the temper of the parties, could give any reason to suppose them violently enamoured.

That this lady accepted his propofals, feems much lefs furprifing, than that he fhould have made them. It is probable, his fituation at the head of a fect, and the authority it conferred, was not without it's charms in the eye of an ambitious female; it being pretty generally admitted, that the principle of the motto, " aut Cæsar, aut nullus," is by no means confined to the lords of the creation. But we much wonder, that Mr Wesley fhould have appeared, in this inftance at least, fo little acquainted with himself and with human nature. He certainly did not posses the conjugal virtues. He had no tafte for the tranquillity of domestic retirement : while his fituation, as an itinerant, kept him confantly in motion, and left him little leifure for those attentions, which are absolutely neceffary to the comfort of married life.

His excursions through every part of the nation, and his epistolary correspondences with women of all ages and classes, could have no happy effect on a perfon of Mrs Wesley's complexion. Nor was she by any means reconciled to the idea, that she possesses which she had promised herfelf; having always settled it as a principle, that, as the wife of Mr Wesley, she had an undoubted title to a full moiety of his authority.

His vexations in the married flate were infinite. On one occasion she feized his letters and other papers, and put them into the hands of such at she knew to be his enemies, that they might be printed, as prefumptive proofs of illicit connexions: and frequently, when the ( 127 ) pirit of jealoufy came upon her, fhe would order a chaife, and drive a hundred miles, to obferve from the window, who was in the carriage with him on his entrance into a town.

When Mr Welley married, he certainly ventured on the most unhappy connexion, in which he ever was engaged. It is obvious to reflect, though no great encomium on his knowledge of the fex, that had he fearched the kingdom through, he could not have pitched upon a perfon lefs proper for a gentleman in his fituation. The passions of this lady fometimes hurried her into outrage and indecency. More than once fhe laid violent hands upon his perfon, and tore those venerable locks which had fufficiently fuffered from the ravages of time. She left him for the first time in 1771: and they finally parted about the year

1775. So that when he was told fhe had left his houfe, determined never to return, we cannot much wonder at the fang froid with which he reflects upon it; "non eam reliqui; non dimifi; non revocabo." At her death, which happened at Chelfea, in October 1781, fhe bequeathed her fortune, amounting, it is faid, to about five thousand pounds, to a Mr Vizelle. To Mr Wesley she left nothing but a ring.

His domeftic uneafineffes had little influence on his public life. The only confiderable interval of labour, was during a confumptive diforder, which attacked him not long after his marriage. During this illnefs, which lafted about four months, he retired first to Lewissham, and then to the Hotwells at Bristol; when, not being able to preach, he employed himself in writing notes on the New ( 129 )

Testament. It was at this time, as he informs us, that, "to prevent vile panegyric," he wrote the following epitaph, dated November 26. 1753:

Here lieth

the body of JOHN WESLEY, a brand plucked out of the burning: who died of a confumption in the fifty-first year of his age, not leaving, after his debts are paid, ten pounds behind him :

Praying,

God be merciful to me an unprofitable servant!

"He ordered, that this, if any infeription, fhould be placed on his tomb-flone."

In the March following he began to preach again. In August he had a relapse, and was again ordered by Dr Fothergill to return to the Hot-wells, where his regimen was very near being cut Vol. II. I ( 130 )

fhort, by the weight of a jack, that fell upon his head. Soon recovering, he went on as ufual, and extended his labours from the three kingdoms to all their dependencies. The Ifles of Wight and Scilly, Jerfey, Guernfey, the Ifle of Man, and most parts of Wales were visited in their turn, till circuits were established in each, and supplied with the most punctual regularity.

Whoever is acquainted with the fubject, must have perceived, in the progress of methodism, the operation of a principle which, in every stage, has debased and degraded it; and that is, a frequent tendency to enthusias and extravagance. The instances upon record are too numerous to be particularly noticed. It will be sufficient to distinguish the most remarkable. Among these is the case of George Bell, formerly a ferjeant in the guards, who took it into his head to pretend an express revelation, that the last of February 1763, would be the period of the confummation of all things; and by this ridiculous chimera, turned the heads of half the metropolis. Not content with this, he had the impious prefumption, to pretend to work miracles. Mr Wefley, who gave too much encouragement to this infolent enthusiaft, fays, that by his prayers, a young woman was inftantaneoufly cured of an inveterate complaint in her breaft; and, in his usual mode of decision, observes, " 1. She was ill; 2. fhe is well; 3. fhe was fo in a moment. Now, which of these can with any modesty be denied?" As the evidence is not before the public, it is impoffible to remark upon it : but, on the other hand, as we conceive miracles to have ceafed foon after the apofolic age, we beg leave to fay, the report of an individual, or even of half a dozen brain-fick enthufiafts, is not fufficient to eftablish a principle, exploded by the majority, and the wifest of mankind.

Another subject of his miraculous operations, was a blind fidler. Having anointed his eyes with clay or fpittle, (we forget which) he pronounced the authoritative EPHPHATHA, and commanded them to be opened. But in this inftance at least, the fervant was not "as his mafter." And from fuch a cale, one would fuppole, every one not abfolutely lunatic, must perceive, that this observation* of our Saviour was not intended for univerfal application. The word of our military apostle was not with power. The man continued, as he had long been,

* Every one that is perfect, shall be as his master.

( 133 )

as blind as a ftone: while the operator, whofe fpiritual pride was fortunately feconded by a little convenient fubtilty, not at all difcouraged by fo stubborn a fact, nor a jot more dubious of his miffion, as a worker of miracles, vindicated himfelf at the expence of his patient, and declared, he had not faith to be healed! How it came to pass, that a worker of miracles could neither confer nor increase faith, under such circumflances, does not clearly appear: but it was unfortunate for the patient, that the powers of his operator were limited to one species of miracle; that the gift of faith and of vision happened to be two diffinct operations; and that from this unfortunate defect, the poor fellow was under the neceffity of remaining as he was, and of continuing his occupation of fiddling in Moorfields for his fubfiftence.

( 134 )

It is a little extraordinary too, that the cafe of this man should be fo much more obstinate, than that of Mary Special, the young woman he is faid to have cured, and that a power fo remarkably conferred, should have been to fuddenly withdrawn! Since that time, he is faid to have received another revelation; that he should be incapable of pain; and that he should never die. Whether he is yet alive, we know not. If he be, it is hoped his neighbours will keep a sharp look out, that they may be edified with the prospect of his translation. Perhaps some of them may be fo fortunate as to catch the mantle of this Elijah!

The last effay at the trade of prophecy is of a later date. In 1789, it was revealed by an angel, to a young girl in a northern county, that, on a certain day in that year, the wicked should be swept with the befom of destruction, from the face of the earth. This was excellent news for the vifionaries, who believed the report. The girl was confulted as an expounder of the fates. Not the oracular tripods of former times, nor even the holy fepulchre at Mecca, were ever visited with more reverent devotion. Whole troops of pilgrims reforted to this female oracle. Stammerers, who fancied themfelves called to be preachers, were informed by the condefcending angel, whether they fhould be appointed the teachers and inftructors of mankind; and multitudes, who were too lazy to work, and too diffipated to flav at home, travelled on various pretences, to be instructed in futurity, and to learn whole lands they fhould occupy in the approaching defolation. How they adjusted the partition, we are not well informed. We only know, it was not without fome bickerings; and that a little cobler, not far from Sunderland, put in his claim to the eftate of a rich general in the neighbourhood. The affair ended as might naturally be expected. It was a bufiness more carnal than fpiritual, and inolved a commerce certainly not angelic: fo that in due time the public credulity fubfiding, and other circumstances rendering it necessary, the girl and her paramour wifely decamped, and embarked together for the continent.

It must be granted, that the extravagancies of individuals are not always to be imputed to a collective body. There is only one instance in which they ought to be fo imputed; and that is, when there are fome general principles, peculiar to that body, which naturally produce them. It is true alfo, that nerther the authors nor the abettors of this last imposture were methodists, but rather a detachment from the main body, who, under the direction of two ignorant men, and on pretence of fuperior fanctity, had withdrawn from the connexion. But fuch proceedings are always worthy of the feverest animadverfion; and they are particularly noticed in these pages, not only by way of caution to others, who may be inclined to fimilar extravagancies; but chiefly becaufe Mr Wefley did not fufficiently guard against them. And it is very remarkable, that for the last thirty years, almost every thing of this kind, whether among the methodists, or those who have feceded from them, has originated with the most vehement sticklers for his scheme of perfection.

The truth is, that, from an excels of charity, he was extremely fubject to impofition, and too readily gave credit to any report from those, of whole fanctity he had conceived a favourable impreffron. Hence his notion of the witneffes of perfection. They faid they were perfect, and he believed them. He was a warm oppofer of the idea, that miracles have cealed; and took it for granted, which was furely as wild a dream as ever entered the mind of a fenfible man, that. had we as much faith as the primitive christians, we should still be endued with fimilar powers. Hence he was a believer in modern miracles; and challenges any man, who has read Montgeran's demonstration of the miracles at the tomb of Abbè Paris, "to doubt of them, if he can." How it may be among the Jansenists in France, is another question; but in this nation, there are few fenfible men, who do not doubt them; and most people will be of opinion, that their invalidity is fufficiently demonstrated by Dr Campbell, in his answer to Mr Hume.

In this connexion, it will not be impertinent to prefent the reader with the following relation. It is taken from the feventh volume of Mr Wefley's fermons, and is produced by him as an authentic fact, in illustration of St. Paul's allusion, in the 13th chap. of 1. Cor. to the gift of prophecy. He relates it in thefe words:

"A little before the conclusion of the late war in Flanders, one who came from thence gave us a very ftrange relation. I knew not what judgment to form of this; but waited till John Haim should come over, of whose veracity I could no more doubt, than of his understanding.

( 140 )

The account he gave was this. ' Jonathan Pyrah was a member of our fociety in Flanders. I knew him fome years, and knew him to be a man of an unblameable character. One day he was fummoned to appear before the board of general officers. One of them faid, what is this that we hear of you? We hear you are turned prophet, and that you foretel the downfal of the bloody house of Bourbon, and the haughty house of Austria. We should be glad if you were a real prophet, and if your prophecies came true. But what fign do you give, to convince us you are fo, and that your predictions will come to pafs? He readily answered, gentlemen, I give you a fign. To-morrow, at twelve o'clock, you shall have such a storm of thunder and lightning, as you never had before, fince you came into Flanders. I give you a fecond fign : as little as any of you expect any fuch thing, as little appearance of it as there is now, you shall have a general engagement with the French within three days. I give you a third fign: I fhall be ordered to advance in the first line. If I am a false prophet, I fhall be fhot dead at the first discharge. But if I am a true prophet, I shall only receive a mufket ball in the calf of my left leg.' At twelve the next day, there was fuch thunder and lightning as they never had in Flanders. On the third day, contrary to all expectation, was the general battle of Fontenoy. He was ordered to advance in the first line. And at the very first discharge, he did receive a musket ball in the calf of his left leg.

"And yet all this profited him nothing, either for temporal or eternal happinefs. When the war was over, he returned to England; but the ftory was got before him: in confequence of which he was fent for by the Countefs of St—s*, and feveral other perfons of quality, who were defirous of hearing fo furprifing an account from his own mouth. He could not bear fo much honour. It quite turned his brain. In a little time he went ftark mad: and fo he continues to this day, living ftill, as I apprehend, on Webley Moor Side, within a few miles of Leeds."

So much for this military prophet. Mr Wefley remarks in a note, that he is fince dead: but we are not able to afcertain whether there be any account of him and his predictions in the papers, or other periodical publications of that time. If any gentleman is in pofferfion of information on this fubject, the intelligence is worth communicating to the public.

CHAP. IV.

METHODISM IN NORTH AMERICA.-EXECUTION OF THE DEED OF DECLARATION IN 1784.

OR a confiderable time, Mr White-field was the only methodift who directed his attention to the new world, where he was, if possible, even more popular than in Europe. There he finished his life and his labours; and his remains, which were deposited in a small town in New England, called Newbury Port, remaining, through the temperature of the vault in which they were interred, in a Aate of remarkable prefervation, are frequently, from curiofity or veneration, vifited by travellers on the continent.

After fome years, feveral methodifts having emigrated from this country, and formed focieties in New York and Philadelphia, wrote to Conference for a fupply of preachers. In confequence of this application, Mr Boardman and Mr Pillmoor, the ableft and most respectable that were ever fent to America, offered their fervices, and were chearfully accepted. They took with them fifty pounds as a prefent from Conference, and landed on the continent, in the latter end of 1769. The latter retired from the connexion in difgust, and going a fecond time abroad, was ordained by an American bilhop, and is now paftor of one of the churches in Philadelphia.

Being prefently followed by others, their fuccefs was confiderable; fo that on the commencement of the late war, they had raifed more than twenty preach( 145 )

ers, and formed focieties in Maryland, Virginia, New York, and Penfylvania, including about three thousand perfons. During the war, they still proceeded in the profecution of their plan, and in fpite of the interruptions of fuch a scene of confusion and blood, were continually on the increase. They might however have been much more fuccefsful, had they observed a proper referve on the fcore of politics. Those, who had any diferetion, did fo; but fome were imprudent enough, forgetting their immediate employment, to take part in a controverfy, with which they had little concern; and, by this means, rendered themfelves obnoxious to the civil powers. One preacher, who now refides not a hundred miles from London, was obliged, from fome imprudencies he had committed, in the over-officiousness of his zeal, to make a precipitate retrest: and we hope he is as thankful to providence as he ought to be, for fo happy an efcape. The anniversary of that day we advife him to keep faced.

Another of his brethren was equally fortunate. Having been foized by fome American fcouts, and brought before their commanding officer, # So Sir, faid the general, after observing the poflure of our affairs, and giving all the intelligence you could procure, to the British army, you come to me for a paffport! But you shall have it, Sir; and when you arrive in England, do us juffice, and fay, we have dealt generoully with you." We mention these anecdotes, which we know to be authentic, to fhew how abfurd it was for millionaries, especially at fuch a time, and in fo active a manner, to interfere with politics; and to remind them what a figure they had cut, had their zeal been recompenced, as ufual, by the fummary process of the tar-brush or the halter!

In the history of American methodian, during this period, a circumstance happened, peculiarly important to the focieties, and too remarkable to be omitted. When Mr Welley changed his politics, and published his " Calm Address to the American Colonies," many copies were shipped for New York. A gentleman of that country, alarmed for the fafety of a people, with whom he was connected, and trembling for the probable confequences, should a pamphlet of fuch a tendency pass into general circulation, laid violent hands upon it, and deftroyed or feturned the whole impression: fo that, till a confiderable time after this transaction, fearcely any one had heard K 2 that fuch a piece had been published. This incident was the falvation of methodifm in America.

Mr Wefley, who was frequently preffed to return once more to the continent, never vifited that country after the commencement of itinerancy; which is the more furprifing, as he had not the leaft fear of the fea, and as there was a powerful incentive to his croffing the water, in the apprehenfion he had formed concerning one or two of the foreign preachers, whom he fuspected of fome defigns of independency. His last foreign voyage was to Holland. On Thurfday, June 12. 1783, he embarked at Harwich, arrived the next day at Helvoetfluys, and went on to Rotterdam, the Hague, Haerlem, Leyden, Utrecht, and Amsterdam. Nothing material happened during this journey. He preached feveral times in Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and Utrecht, and was particularly pleafed with the drefs of the Dutch ladies, which he fays, was " fimplex munditiis, plain and neat in the higheft degree;" and with the peculiar care they take of their ftreets and houses. He controverts the common opinion, that the Hollanders are of a "cold, phlegmatic, unfriendly temper," and fays, that he had not met with a "more warmly affectionate people in all Europe; not even in Ireland !" And in his usual fondness for simplicity of attire, he takes care, more than once, to mention the drefs of these ladies. 66 F observe, fays he, of all the pious people in Holland, that, without any rule, but the word of God, they drefs as plain as Mifs March did formerly, and Mifs Johnfon does now! And confidering the vaft kiladvantage they are under, having no

( 150 )

connexion with each other, and being under no fuch difcipline at all as we are, I wonder at the grace of God that is in them."

What inference Mr Wefley would deduce from this confideration we know not: but the natural conclusion feems to be, that the most fervent piety does not neceffarily depend upon the methodiftic discipline, and that a confiderable part at least of that discipline, may without danger be difpenfed with. If these ladies dreffed with fuch propriety, though without any other rule than the word of God. then we conclude, that no other rule is. seceffary. We suspect too, that the impolition of any other is improper, and an invalion of the rights of men; and that in all those inferior circumstances, which we properly rank among things indiffe. rent and noneffential, common fente is a

In the beginning of July Mr Welley returned to London; but does not take his leave of Holland without a fling at the moravians. He had gone over to Zielt, the fettlement of the German brethren : of which he fays, " it is a fmall village, finely fituated, with woods on every fide, and much refembles one of the large colleges in Oxford. Here I met with my old friend, Bishop Antone, whom I had not seen for near fifty years. He did not alk me to eat or drink; for "it is not their cuftom !" And there is an inn! But they were all very courteous. And we were welcome to buy any thing that we pleafed at their fhops! I cannot fee how it is poffible for this community, to avoid growing immenfely rich."

Whether he had any particular defign in his vifit to Holland, we are not informed. If he meant to eftablifh a miffion from this country, it was an improbable attempt, nor has any part of it been taken into the methodift plan. Perhaps it was a mere vifit of civility to fome religious friends.

As Mr Wefley advanced in years, he grew anxious for the perpetuity of that fystem of doctrine and discipline, and the whole of that œconomy which he had so long laboured to establish : and many of his friends uniting in the same views, feveral confultations took place, and various plans were proposed for this purpose. During his life, it was natural to conclude, from the long term of years in which he had presided at their head, from their wonderful increase during his administration, and from the fingular veneration in which he was held, that his authority would remain inviolate, and confequently, that he would be confidered as a centre of union by all the preachers, whether local or ithnerant. They looked up to him with admiration for his learning and abilities; they effeemed him for his unexampled labours; and they loved him as another parent. But it was easy to perceive, that these considerations, which cemented the union betwixt the preachers and him, could be applicable to himfelf alone. They had been accustomed to yield to him an obedience, which they would fcarcely allow to be due to any other: nor indeed was there any probability that his place would be filled by a fucceffor, fo calculated for the head of a fect, and fo wonderfully fitted for preferving an afcendancy over the minds of men. For this species of government he certainly has not beft an equal.

Confiderations of this fort induced him to think of a plan for their future union. He warned the preachers in print, that they might expect, that those who aimed "at cafe, honour, or profit, or had any thing in view, but the glory of God," would not remain in the connexion : and he predicted, that forme would " procure preferment in the church, and others turn independents, and get feparate congregations." He adviled, that, on notice of his decease, all the preachers, in Britain and Ireland, fliould repair to London within fix weeks; that, after a day of folemn fafting and prayer, they should draw up articles of agreement, to be figned by those who chose to act in concert; and chuse, from the body of travelling preachers, a committee of three, five, or feven; one of them to be moderator, in order to propose perfons to be tried and admitted as preachers, or to be excluded the connexion; to fix the circuit of each preacher for the enfuing year, to appoint the rime of the next conference, and to fuperintend the general accommy of the focieties.

It was not eafy, and perhaps it was not neceffary, in this cafe, to fix upon a plan which fhould keep to large a body, and with fuch a number of different movements, exactly in their ufual courfe. Some deviations from the original fystem might be not an injury, but an improvement. This however was approved by the preachers in conference. It was ordered to be printed; and it was more likely to anfwer Mr Wefley's purpose, than any other we have feen. It incimated, what was certainly true, the firits equality of the preachers; it paid a proper attention to what they had learnt to confider as their inalienable privilege, the right to vote in conference, of which each was equally a member; and it provided for the conduct of the undertaking in general, by the confent and participation of every individual, who was admitted as an itinerant.

In order, if possible, to lay a foundation for this future union, Mr Wesley called upon the preachers, affembled in conference, to fign an agreement, during his life, stating that they would "devote themselves entirely to God; daily denying themselves, and taking up their cross; that they would preach the old methodist doctrines, contained in the minutes of conferences, and no other; and that they would enforce the whole methodist difcipline, laid down in the faid minutes."

. مر This agreement was figned by many of the preachers; but whether they figned it or not, it was of no fort of consequence: Should any fublequent event throw a different light on the fubject, and create different views in the majority, fuch a fignature would never be confidered as of fufficient force to prevent any alterations which prudence or caprice might dictate: and it was indeed an ufeless and unnecessary restraint. The views of mankind vary at different periods. Deviations from original plans and preconceived opinions are often the necessary confequence of revolving years, and the mutability of human affairs: and the truth may fafely be trufted to vindicate and fupport itself. If the doctrine and difcipline in queftion should be found, on repeated trial, and by the experience of many years, to be the best and most ferip-

tural, there was no fear of it's continuance, enlightened as the world now is, without the affiftance of fublicriptions and agreements : and if the contrary, the sooner both should undergo a reformation, the better. But it is a fond, and we believe, a very natoral conceit, that our own fystem must be fuperior to every other. In this inflance, most of us are popes, and in our little way, contend, by implication at least, for the old doctrine of infallibility. Mr Wesley, sensible and judicious as he was in many refpects. was not fuperior to this common foible. He had no idea of any thing to perfect and complete in all it's parts, as the doctrine and discipline he had introduced : and he naturally concluded, that the prefervation of methodifm, in it's original purity, was the prefervation of the chriftian doctrine, in theory and in practice.

As the preachers were perfectly fatilfied with the fletch drawn up for their conduct, after Mr Welley's deceafe, they remained quite at cafe; and had no fur fpicion of any change of mosfures. But they were foon rouled from this lethargy. By the machinations of ignorance and ambition, some years after the publication of this plan, a scheme was in contemplation, and prefently put ic practice, by the famous deed of declaration, which was executed about the year 1784. This deed, in the mind of the projector, had two objects; one oftenfible, the other concealed : and as it ufually happens in fuch cafes, that which was concealed, was, in his estimation, of at least equal importance with the other. The oftenfible object, was the fecurity of the meeting houfes. That which was concealed, was the exclusion of fome preachers of the best character, but, on political accounts, obnoxious to fome of Mr Wefley's friends. As the houfes were respectively settled on a certain number of truftees, for the use of preachers appointed by Mr Wesley in conference, during his natural life, or by the conference after his deceale, it was judged neceffary, and accordingly propofed by Dr Coke, in Mr Wesley's name, and acceded to by the preachers affembled at Briftol in 1783, that a deed, declarative of the meaning of the word conference, a term unknown in law, fhould be executed, and enrolled in the high court of chancery. As every itinerant had always confidered himself, on his admission to travel, as a member of conference, and as the intended felection of one hundred was industriously concealed, not a man, except a few, who were in the fecret, had the least idea of what was going forward. Confidering themfelves as a fort of irregulars, among whom all were equal, or at least, where there could be no fuperiority, but that of character and abilities, the ninety-one, who were to be excluded, till the very moment the combustibles were prepared, the match lighted, and the explosion ready to take place, that was to offer them up as facrifices to the ambition of a few, remained without the least sufpicion .---When they faw the deed, it was with aftonishment and indignation. The injustice of the thing itself, and the fingular manœuvres by which the fanction of this forlorn hope had been obtained to their own exclusion, stared them full in the face. They found, that in confenting to this deed, they had confented, that all the affairs of the connexion Vor. II. I.

( 162 )

should be lodged in the hundred nrentioned in the declaration; that they fhould be the lords and rulers of the reft: and if they thought proper, fhould have it in their power to turn any other preacher out of conference by the fhoulders, and tell him he had no bufinefs there. The exclusion itself was both an iniquitous and a mortifying measure. But the partiality of it rendered it still more opprefive, Some of the oldeft and ableft preachers in the connexion were excluded. Many of the felected members were not only deficient in abilities, but fome of them, at the time of their infertion in the deed, were only upon trial, and not yet admitted as itinerants: while the chief qualifications of feveral others were ignorance, fanaticism. and ductility. Under fuch circumstances, it is no wonder if the perfons excluded thought themfelves aggrieved. They were really fo, and they made no fcruple to declare their fentiments. They fent circular letters, inviting all the preachers to canvas the bufinefs at the enfuing conference. A large number affembled; when fuch an inftance of human weaknefs was difplayed, as, we hope, is not often to be found. Though a great number of the preachers were as averfe to the deed, as those who had fo decidedly oppofed it, and had repeatedly execrated the measure, both by letter and in converfation, they had not the courage to avow their fentiments in conference. When Mr Wesley made a fpeech, in which, with a feverity that may be better conceived than expressed, he inveighed against the five preachers who oppofed the meafure, and invited all who were of his mind to ftand up; they all rofe to a man. The five were found guilty of high crimes and mifdemeanors, in having prefumed to condemn a plan he had adopted, and it was unanimoufly determined, though at leaft forty or fifty of the conference were of the fame judgment with those they condemned, that they should either make concessions, or be difmissed. An instance of duplicity, as indecent and dishonourable, as we hope, for the honour of human nature, it is uncommon !

At this conference was the late venerable Mr Fletcher. Urged by his entreaties, and anxious for the reftoration of peace, the preachers in the opposition apologized to Mr Wessey, for printing the circular letter, without having first appealed to conference. The only circumstance in which these preachers have reason to condemn themselves is, that their zeal for the re-establishment of concord and unanimity carried them too far, and induced them to acknowledge, that in this mode of proceeding they had finned (for that was the word Mr Wefley infifted upon) and to make conceffions much greater than he or any man had a right to demand, or they, with any propriety could comply with. In confequence of this apology, he affured them, in a verbal meffage, communicated by a preacher, now living, that he would take measures to put them on a footing with the reft. Satisfied with this information, they took a circuit as ulual, till, finding that his promife would not be observed, and that it was in vain to expect redrefs, they left the connexion. The remonstrants having many friends, this tranfaction produced great heats and animofities. As it is little understood, even among the methodifts, and as in all the remarks upon it in the Arminian Magazine, and by other channels of information, it has been inaccurately flated, or greatly mifreprefented; and above all, as it formed a new æra, and a very remarkable revolution in the policy of methodifm, we have thought proper thus circumftantially to flate it, for the information of our readers; affuring them, that this account is as accurate and impartial as truth and candour can make it.

It has often been afked, by thole who were ignorant of the circumftances of this affair, as well as by thole who were the friends and promoters of it, what was the pretence for all this oppolition, and in what respects these preachers were injured by the deed of declaration. To the latter an answer is unneceffary; for were they not well aware of it's partiality, of the precedence it confers on them, and the injury it does the excluded members, they had never been to forward to defend it. They patronize it, becaufe they feel the fuperiority it gives them; and confequently, becaufe they know it to be unjuft.

But to the former, and to all who wish for information on this subject, we answer, the injury in this case is obvious. The deed deprives the excluded preachers of their indifputable right to a vote in conference; a right which, by earlieft usage, and in the very nature of the thing, was theirs from the moment they were admitted as itinerants; and from which they could not justly be deposed, but by fome mental or moral incapacity. It places them in an inferiority to others, to whom they are in all respects equal; and converting their equals into masters, it obliges those who are not included in the deed, either to leave the connexion, or to fubmit to their authority, and to go where they shall appoint. We may naturally fuppole, that nothing can be more mortifying to a man of fenfe, than to lie at the mercy, and be under the direction of a. man, or a number of men, of whole integrity he has no opinion, or whom he knows to be ignorant and incompetent. It is eafy to fay; and it has often been faid, by people who were of one or both these descriptions (for a man of sense and candour would be infinitely fuperior to fuch fentiments) "let them feek fome other employment." But where is the justice of obliging a man, who has fpent his prime in fuch a fervice, to feek, in his old age, another mode of fupport, and when the lamp of life begins to be exftinguished, to enter upon a new scene of action, which would require all the industry and exertions of youth? There is a cruelty in this mode of thinking and acting, for which language has no name sufficiently expressive of it's unfeelingness and malignancy: and fincerely do we despise the man who is capable of it. We are forry to fay, that in the progress of methodism, we have seen much of this spirit; and as we abhor every species of oppression, we are happy in an opportunity of holding it up as it deferves, to the public execution.

Having thus animadverted upon what we deem a most impolitic transaction, it is proper to observe, that this was a violation of the original compact, to which Mr Wessey's superior understanding was justly abhorrent, and into which he was forced by the mere dint of sophiftry and importunity. Though the executive department was in him, the plan had a lefs reputable origin, and was always, and we believe, juftly aferibed to another fource. In the cafe of Mr Wefley, we can lament the infirmities of age, and pity a ductility which we cannot approve; but in favour of his advifers in this bufinefs we make no fuch diffinction.

CHAP. V.

Consecration of Bishops and Ordination of Priests for America, by Imposition of the Hands of Mr Wesley.

A S Dr Coke is largely concerned in the events of this chapter, it will be neceffary briefly to inform the public who he is. Of his family and connexions in early life we have nothing to fay. But it is proper to obferve, that he is a elergyman, and received his academical education at Jefus College, Oxford, where he was admitted to the degree of L. L. D. In 1776 he relinquifhed a curacy in the weft of England, and joined Mr Wefley, who, fince that time, ( 172 )

has employed him as a kind of vicar general, empowering him to visit the focieties in different parts of the kingdom, and once or twice to hold conferences in Ireland, when it was inconvenient for himfelf to crofs the water. From his known character, and a certain consequence he derived from his ecclefiaftic and academical distinctions, he has often been fuspected of cafting a longing eye to the fupremacy, after Mr Wefley's deceafe; and fome have thought he would attain it. But we doubt not to predict the contrary. The chair will certainly be filled by no individual. And in cafe of fuch a fucceffion, the diffinction between the former and the prefent poffeffor would be too ftrongly marked, and might produce, from the united influence of reason and propriety in fome, and of envy and jealoufy in others, an opposition, which every man, who has the leaft regard for this own peace, would be careful to avoid.

At the conclusion of the war in America, and feveral years after the establishment of methodism on the continent, this gentleman, by the direction of Mr Wesley, and under circumstances too remarkable to pass without notice, paid them a visit.

There was a time when, by thole who were best acquainted with the fubject, it was fupposed, for obvious reasons, that a final separation had taken place of the methodists on this fide the Atlantic, from those beyond it. We shall explain this. It is to be observed, that from the first appointment of preachers by the conference in England, to the foreign milfion, the American methodists were always confidered as brethren, and their numbers and the names of their focieties regularly inferted in the minutes. During the war this ufage was difcontinued. The rebels, as they were called, were expunged from the lift. The revolution of affairs abroad, was productive of a correspondent revolution at the City Road. A lucky hit converted rebels into fimple revolutionists. The Americans again appeared in the minutes. A variety of confultations were held in the cabinet concerning them; where a refolution was agreed to, and as fuddenly executed, that a letter should be prepared by Mr Wefley, congratulating them on their freedom from the "ftate and the hierarchy," and exhorting them to "fland fast in that liberty with which God had fo ftrangely made them free." At the fame time and place, he gave ordination, more episcopi, by imposition of hands, to feveral preachers, who were to embark for America, and confecrated Dr Coke one of the bishops of the methodist epifcopal church in that country; making him the bearer of his congratulatory letter, and giving him fpecial inftructions to confecrate, as his colleague in the epifcopacy, a lay preacher, who had refided feveral years on the continent. The Doctor, attended by the new made prefbyters, croffed the water, and executed his commission; confectating Mr Aft. bury, and ordaining feveral others, as prefbyters of this new church, and beginning or concluding the folemnity with a very remarkable fermon, in defence of these extraordinary proceedings. To affift their devotions, a liturgy was extracted by Mr Wefley from that of the church of England, from which we have been informed, particular care was taken to expunge every expression that had a pointed reference to the authority of kings.

Before we enter upon an examination of this part of Mr Wefley's conduct, it will be proper to flate his reafons for fuch a deviation from his former principles, by fubjoining a copy of the paftoral letter, which, on this occasion he tranfmitted to the focieties abroad. It is addreffed " Fo Dr Coke, Mr Aftbury, and our Brethren in North America;" and is conceived in remarkable terms.

"By a very uncommon train of providences, many of the provinces of North America are totally difjoined from the mother country, and erected into independent ftates. The English government has no authority over them, either civil or ecclesiaftical, any more than over the States of Holland. A civil authority is exercifed over them, partly by the congrefs, partly the provincial affemblies. But no one exercifes, or claims any ecclefiaftical authority at all. In this peculiar fituation, fome thoufands of the inhabitants of the ftates defire my advice; and in compliance with their defire, I have drawn up a little fketch.

"Lord King's account of the primitive church convinced me many years ago, that bifhops and prefbyters are the fame order, and confequently, have the fame right to ordain. For many years I have been importuned, from time to time, to exercife this right, by ordaining part of our travelling preachers. But I have ftill refufed, not only for peace's fake; but becaufe I was determined, as little as possible, to violate the established order of the national church, to whick I belonged.

Vol. II.

"But the cafe is widely different between England and North America. Here there are bifhops, who have a legal jurifdiction. In America there are none, neither any parifh minifters. So that for fome hundred miles together, there is none either to baptize, or to adminifter the Lord's fupper. Here therefore, my foruples are at an end: and I conceive myfelf at full liberty, as I violate no order, and invade no man's right, by appointing and fending labourers into the harveft.

"I have accordingly appointed Dr Coke and Mr Francis Aftbury, to be joint fuperintendents over our brethren in North America; as alfo Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vafey, to act as elders among them, by baptizing and administering the Lord's fupper. And I have prepared a liturgy, differing little from that of the church of England (i think the best constituted national church in the world) which I advise all the travelling preachers to use on the Lord's day in all the congregations, reading the litany only on Wednesdays and Fridays, and praying extempore on all other days. I also advise the elders to administer the fupper of the Lord on every Lord's day.

" If any one will point out a more rational and fcriptural way of feeding and guiding those poor sheep in the wilderness, I will gladly embrace it. At prefent I cannot see any better method than that I have taken.

"It has indeed been propoled, to defire the English bishops to ordain part of our preachers for America. But to this I object. 1. I defired the Bishop of London to ordain only one; but could not prevail: 2. If they confented, we know M 2 the flowneis of their proceedings; but the matter admits of no delay. 3. If they would ordain them now, they would likewife expect to govern them. And how grievoully would that entangle us? 4. As our American brethren are now totally difentangled, both from the state and the English hierarchy, we dare not entangle them again, either with the one or the other. They are now at full liberty, fimply to follow the fcripture and the primitive church. And we judge it best, that they should stand fast in that liberty, wherewith God has fo ftrangely made them free."

As Dr Coke's fermon * on the confecration of Mr Aftbury to the office of a bishop, is to the fame purpose, and a laboured defence of Mr Wesley's conduct, we extract from it all that relates to this * Published at Baltimore in Virginia, in 1784.

Rubject. The first proposition, which inthis fermon, the Doctor engages to treat, is a defence of his conduct in the confeeration of his colleague; which he does in these words:

" The church of England, of which the fociety of methodifts in general have, till lately profetled themfelves a part, did for many years groan in America, under grievances of the heaviest kind. Subjected to a hierarchy, which weighs every thing in the fcale of politics, it's most important interests were repeatedly facrificed to the fuppofed advantages of England. The churches were in general filled with the parafites and bottle. companions of the rich and great. The humble and most importunate entreaties of the oppressed flocks, yea, the reprefentations of a general affembly itfelf, were contemned and despised. Every M 3.

thing facred must bow down at the feet of a party; the holinefs and happinefs of mankind be facrificed to their views; and the drunkard, the fornicator, and the extortioner triumphed over bleeding Zion, becaufe they were faithful abettors of the ruling powers. Bleffed be God, and praifed be his holy name, that the memorable revolution * has ftruck off these intolerable fetters, and broken the antichristian union, which before subfifted between church and flate. And had there been no other advantage arifing from that glorious epoch, this itfelf, I believe, would have made ample compenfation for all the calamities of the war. One happy confequence of which, was the expulsion of most of those hirelings, who "ate the fat, and cloathed themfelves with the wool, but strengthened not the difeafed, neither healed that which was fick, neither bound up that which was broken, neither brought again that which was driven away, neither fought that which was loft."

"The parochial churches in general being hereby vacant, our people were deprived of the facraments through the greatest part of these states, and continue so still. What method can we take at this critical juncture? God has given us sufficient resources in ourselves, and after mature deliberation, we believe that we are called to draw them forth.

"But what right have you to ordain?" The fame right as most of the reformed churches in Christendom: our ordination, in it's lowest view, being equal to any of the presbyterian, as originating with three presbyters of the church of England.

" But what right have you to exer-M 4.

cife the epifcopal office?" To me the most manifest and clear. God has been. pleafed, by Mr Wesley, to raise up, in America and Europe, a numerous fociety, well known by the name of methodifts. The whole body have invariably esteemed this man as their chief pastor, under Chrift. He has constantly appointed all their religious officers from the higheft to the loweft, by himfelf or his delegate. And we are fully perfuaded, there is no church office which he judges expedient for the welfare of the people entrusted to his charge, but, as effential to his station, he has power to ordain. After long deliberation, he faw it his duty to form his fociety in America into an independent church; but he loved the most excellent liturgy of the church of England; he loved it's rites and ceremonies, and therefore adopted

"Befides, in addition to this, we have every qualification for an epifcopal church, which that of Alexandria (a church of no finall note in the primitive times) poffeifed for two hundred years. Our bishops or fuperintendents (as we rather call them) having been elected or received by the fuffrage of the whole body of our ministers through the continent, affembled in general conference.

"But don't you break the fucceffion?" The uninterrupted fucceffion of bishops is a point that has been long given up by the ablest protestant defenders of epifcopacy. Bishop Hoadley himself, in his celebrated controvers with Dr Calamy, allows it to be unneceffary. His words are, "To the thirteenth question I anfwer, that I think not an uninterrupted ane of fucceffion of regularly ordained bishops necessary." He also grants the authenticity of the anecdote given us by St Jerome, which informs us, that the church of Alexandria, mentioned above, had no regular fucceffion, from the time of St. Mark the Evangelift, the first bifhop of that church to the time of Dionyfius, a fpace of two hundred years : but the college of prefbyters, on the death of a bishop, elected another in his ftead. We are also informed, from the Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, written foon after the death of St. Paul, a writer whole works are next in precedence to the canon of feripture, and probably written by immediate infpiration, that the church of Corinth was then governed only by a college of prefbyters. And from the Epiftle of Polycarp to the church of Philippi, written in 116, we alfo find that the chriftian Philippians. were then governed only by a college of prefbyters. So that the primitive chriftians were fo far from effecting the regular fucceffion, as effential to the conflitution of a chriftian church, that, in fome inflances, eplfcopacy itfelf was. wholly omitted."

"But of all forms of church government, we think a moderate epifcopacy the beft. The executive power being lodged in the hands of one, or at leaft a few, vigour and activity are given to the refolves of the body, and those two effential requisites for any grand undertaking are fweetly united—calmnefs and wifdom in deliberating; and in the executive department, expedition and force.

"But are you not fchifmatics by your feparation from the church?" A chritan church is a body of profeffors, who hold the fundamentals of the christian religion, in doctrine and practice. But we are not ignorant, we cannot be ignorant, that the chief part of the clergy and the members of the church of England (fo called) do either tacitly or explicitly deny the doctrine of justification : by faith, the knowledge of falvation by. the remission of fins, and the witness ofthe Spirit of God, points which we effeem. most fundamental, yea, effentially necesfary to conftitute a child of God. We are not, we cannot be ignorant, that they justify as innocent, many of the criminal. pleafures of the world: card playing, dancing, theatrical amufements, &c. pleafures utterly inconfiftent with unionand communion with God. And though we admire their liturgy, and are determined to retain it with a few alterations, we cannot, we will not hold connexion with them, till the holy fpirit of God has made them fee and feel the evil of the practices, and the importance of the doctrines mentioned above. And for this ichifm (if it must have the name) we are chearfully ready to answer at the bar of God.

"Why then did you not separate before?" It has long been the defire of the majority of the preachers and people. But they submitted to the superior judgment of Mr Wesley, who, till the revolution, doubted of the propriety of the step.

"But did not your preachers conftantly exhort the people to attend the fervice of the church of England?" In the general they did, from a full perfuafion, drawn from experience, that we had no other alternative to preferve our fociety, but an adherence to the church of England, which was totally defitute of real discipline, or a formation of ourfelves into an independent church; and fome of them perhaps did this, with a degree of imprudence, which I cannot defend."

Confidering this ftretch of authority as of great moment in the hiftory of methodifin, and as giving the fanction of Mr Welley's name to a general and formal diffent, at some future period, we have been particular in flating the arguments by which he supported this violation of order, and of his own confiftency: and we have ftated them in the body of this work, rather than in an appendix, becaufe we thought them effential to the narrative, and becaufe we know how few will take the trouble to confult authorities not immediately connected with the facts to which they refer-

The letter figned by Mr Wefley, and addressed to the methodists in America, and the defence of these transactions, in the fermon of Dr Coke, we shall take the liberty to confider, with fome exceptions, as proceeding from the fame fource, The latter is indeed more studied and elaborate than the former : but in each the tendency is the fame: and though the preacher may have altered two or three phrases, or substituted a few sentences, there is no doubt, that the fubstance of it was the work of Mr Wesley. For this opinion we have more reafons than one. The language, in feveral-paffages, filiates itself. It is to be prefumed, he would fcarcely commit to another hand a truft fo ·important, as an apology for fuch extraordinary proceedings. And above all, the ftile and composition bear little refemblance to that of it's reputed authors

a few paffages excepted, which certain characteristic traits have diffinguished as his own.

It will fcarcely be urged in thefe memoirs, as an objection to Mr Wefley's conduct, that he has "broken the fucceffion." As we believe not a fyllable of the uninterrupted fucceffion of bifhops, from the time of the apoftles, we leave the examination of this queftion to thofe whofe faith is more potent and extensive. Our objections are of another kind, and, we prefume, much better founded.

We may just mention, though it were improper to lose much time in confidering, fome prudential reasons affigned for Mr Wesley's conduct. One of them is, that he "had desired the Bishop of London to ordain only one preacher, and could not prevail :" and another, that "had the Bishop ordained such as he recommended, he would have expected to govern them." At the Bishop's refusal, none can wonder, who reflects, that this propofal was made, during the war in America, when it was not perfectly fafe to fend miffionaries abroad; and that it was probable, a regular application would be made by the body of episcopalians in that country, for the confecration of a certain number of bishops, who might ordain the candidates, and fave them the expence and danger of croffing the water. For the reft, nothing can be more plain. On the supposition of accomplishing their scheme of independency, it was obvious, that the English bishops could have no pretensions to govern the clergy on the continent: but, had not the revolution happened, it was equally rational to conclude, that they would Vol. II. N expect the clergy they flould ordain, to be amenable to their jurifdiction.

When the revolution was completed, this connexion was inftantly diffolved, and they now had no fort of dependence either on the state or the hierarchy of Great Britain. But why they should be congratulated on this liberty, in Mr Wefley's letter, it is not easy to determine. It is well known, that he was not friendly to the claims of America, in the contest betwixt her and the mother country; confequently, could be no enthusiast in favour of their civil liberties : and as his discipline was more rigid, and his authority more abfolute than that of the governors of our church, the religious liberty they were promifed, and upon which they are fo particularly congratulated, could be little more than a name.

Much strefs is laid on the doctrine of Sir Peter King, that " bifhops and prefbyters are the fame order, and confequently have the fame right to ordain." To enter into this argument were fuperfluous. There is a much easier and fhorter method of adjusting the debate; and that is, by denying the epifcopal authority of Mr Wefley, on his own ground. If we miltake not, it is the doctrine of Sir Peter, and of the best authorities on this fubject, that at the election of a bishop, in the first ages, there was a folemn convention of the prefbyters and the people; and that from among the former, a bishop was elected, by the fuffrages of the majority. The queition therefore is, by what prefbyters was Mr Wefley elected, in what form was he confecrated to the office, and what fort of a congregation was it, that affifted in the folemnity? It is faid, and fo far as we have been able to discover, from the best authority, that he never was elected by any prefbyters, or confecrated in any form either of the primitive or modern churches, and confequently, even allowing him his principles, he must have exercised, in the confectation of Dr Coke to the epifcopacy, and the ordination of the prefbyters for Scotland and America, an office to which he had no title. And, with the opinion he entertained of the authority of prefbyters, it is a little strange, that he did not fuffer himfelf to be confecrated by two or three clergymen, that he might be the more regularly qualified for the ordination of his candidates.

There is another point of view, in which it is equally clear, that Mr Wefley's ordinations were contrary to the order of all churches, the primitive as well as the modern, as being neither episcopal nor presbyterian. He has always declared himfelf, not a prefbyterian, but an episcopalian. As he was never either elected or confectated to the episcopal office, it is impossible he could ordain as a bishop. On the other hand, though not a bifhop, he did ordain in that character; and, of course, if the intention of the ordainer be of any confequence, his ordinations could not be presbyterian. So that, in whatever light we confider it, here is a capital flaw in the conflictution of this new church. It's bishops are not bishops, and it's prefbyters are not prefbyters; the former not having been elected by a college of prefbyters, fince fuch a college did not exift; and the latter having been ordained by a felf-created bifhop, who could have  $N_3$ no legal jurifdiction, according to the usage of any church, ancient or modern.

The conduct of Mr Wefley in the affumption of the epifcopal office having been frequently canvaffed among the methodifts, by letters, and in familiar converfation, he publifhed a vindication of it in the Arminian Magazine, declaring himfelf " as true and fcriptural a bifhop as any in England, or in Europe;" founding his authority, partly on the ctymology of the Greek word, which fignifies an overfcer; and partly, as we have feen already, on the doctrine of Sir Peter King, that bifhops and prefbyters are the fame order.

To obviate the objection, that fo uncanonical a ftep was in itfelf an act of fchifm, and laid a foundation for a general diffent, he published the fame definition of the church which he gave Dr Coke, to infert in his confectation fermon, and in which there was more ingenuity than argument. Taking hold of an expression in the articles, he defines the church, a catus credentium; a company of believers; and infifts, that from this church he does not feparate. But in this cafe, the fallacy is palpable. Either the framers of our articles did not intend this as a definition of a particular, but rather of the catholic or universal church in every part of the world; or their fenfe of the word believers was not fo limited and confined as that, in which it is conftantly used by Mr Wesley. If the former was the cafe, it is plain, that the argument founded on this definition, is nothing more than a fophifm: and if the latter, it is equally conclusive against the inference he would deduce. In defining a particular church, we are furely not to lay down principles which it has in common with all the churches in the universe, but such as are peculiar to itfelf. "A company of faithful people or believers," is not descriptive of a particular church : and as it may be prefumed, that there is, in every church, a number of " believers," by which term. Mr Welley means only those who are chriflians in the strictest fense of the word, in practice as well as in profession, it is eafy to perceive, on the principle of this definition, that a man may be at once a member of all the churches in the world, however he may differ from them in doctrine or in discipline!

This reafoning was varioufly received. Thofe "fimple ones, who loved fimplicity," and were thorough converts to the doctrine of implicit faith, confidered it as unanfwerable. Others, who had not learned to receive fophiltry for argument, were of another mind, and took care toexpress their disapprobation. The late Mr Henderfon, of Pembroke, who was then a member of the university, informed the author of these remarks, that hewrote to Mr Wefley on this occasion, arguing against these proceedings, and defiring him to confult feveral writers, whom he pointed out. The answer was evalive. He had paffed the Rubicon; and it was now too late to retreat. His conduct, in this stage of the business, was not to be examined, but vindicated :: and, after a vague reply to Mr Henderfon's arguments, he excufed himfelf from going more deeply into the fubject, by observing, that was he to confult all the authors his correspondent had recommended, his remnant of life would be inadequate to the tafk.

We farther object to Mr Wesley's flumption of the epifcopal character, on other principles. We regard him, not as a presbyter of the primitive church, but as he always professed, of the church of England. In this church, there can be no difpute, whether bishops and presbyters are of the fame order, and whether they mutually and indifcriminately ordain presbyters. Here, at least, the authority of each is not the fame: and prefbyters do not consecrate bishops. If so, does that prefbyter, who confectates bishops, and ordains prefbyters by his own authority, in opposition to the inflitutions of his church, "violate no order, and invade no man's right ?" If this be true, words must have lost their meaning. The order of the church fays, that a bishop alone can ordain presbyters, or confecrate bishops. Surely then, a prefbyter ordaining prefbyters, or confectating bishops, must necessarily violate the order of the church, and invade the right of his diocefan, by a formal ulurpation of his office. The part of the world, to which the candidate is ordained, is totally out of the queftion. No prefbyter can usurp the office of a bishop, and continue a member of the church of England; because such usurpation being an offence againit one of it's primary and most diftinguishing institutions, is in itfelf a formal and express renunciation of that church. The diffolution of the jurifdiction of the English prelacy, in America, will not infer Mr Wefley's right to affume it. Rather than violate hisconfiftency, as a clergyman, it had been much more prudent, to have left them to their own refources. They had a multitude of preachers, who, in the most troublefome times, and when he had actually caft them off, managed their concerns with great fuccefs: nor is there any doubt that they might have continued to do fo in future, without his interpofition. And with regard to the want of the ordinances of baptifm and the Lord's fupper, he might have been certain, that either the legiflature, or the people themfelveswould have taken care to fupply that defe&.

In the fermon we have extracted, it is afferted, that Dr Coke and his colleague, Mr Aftbury, have the fame epifcopal qualifications with the church of Alexandria; for they were elected or received by the whole body of ministers through the continent, affembled in conference." We fulpect not. They were in fact elected by Mr Wesley, who confecrated Dr Coke, and directed him to

to the fame for his colleague. The fame may be faid of the prefbyters, to whom he gave ordination at Briftol. And we are informed, that this bulinels was conducted, not in a church, or any place of public worship; but in a private house; in the prefence of a fmall number of witneffes, and with an air of mystery and caution, which afforded no obscure intimation of it's illegality. Of the reception of these bishops and presbyters, in America, we need not fay much. They were obtruded upon them: and it is to be remembered, that the " ministers affembled in conference," who are faid to have received them, were not ministers of any denomination, fince they were never ordained, but plain methodist preachers.

The Doctor, perfectly fatisfied with this own epifcopal qualifications, undertakes to support the authority of Mr Wesley in his appointment. The argument is fimply this: he is "fully perfuaded, fince Mr Wefley has conftantly appointed all the religious officers among the methodists, that there is no churchoffice, which he judges expedient for the welfare of the people, but, as effential to his station, he has a right to ordain." This argument must furely have been intended for the mob. It may poffibly fuit some understandings. But we do not perceive it's force. We finile; but are not convinced; and we think it a pity that the preacher could produce no better logic on fo important an occasion. We fuspect however, that he did mistake it for an argument. And we are the more inclined to this opinion, because we are prefented, in one of his journals with another, in the fame mood and figure. On his arrival in America, in 1784, having opened Mr Wefley's plan, for the focieties on the continent, to a preacher at New York, he informs us, that he highly approved it, and adds, "he preffes me earneftly to make it public, because, as he most justly argues, MR WESLEY HAS DETERMINED THE POINT; AND THEREFORE, IT IS NOT TO BE INVESTIGATED, BUT COMPLIED with." This too is the language of a protestant divine ! And who can read it, without reflecting, how admirable a tool fuch a reasoner must have made for the Bonners and Gardiners, the prelates and the tyrants of the fifteenth century?

To cite Mr Welley's former conduct as a proof of his right to do what he should think proper, in any fublequent period, may fatisfy cafuilts of a certain defcription; and to fome readers it may be an argument ad bominem; but to us it is ignotum per ignotius; and, as it now itands, needs nothing but an invertion, to reduce it to the old circular argument of the Jefuits. Having adduced what Mr Wefley has done, in order to prove what he may do, nothing remains, but to advance what he may do, as an argument of the propriety of what he has done.

This new fystem of episcopacy has brought the methodists into a curious predicament. Here are two bodies of people, in Britain and in America, believing the fame doctrines, observing the fame mode of worship and general difcipline, and closely connected with each other, who are yet, in one respect, totally separate and distinct. In Britain, they are churchmen; in America, independents. In the former, it seems, no

realon appears for a feparation from the the church: while in the latter, becaufe "the clergy are wicked and corrupt, in doctrine and practice, becaufe there fubfifts an antichriftian union between the church and ftate; becaufe the bishops have paid no attention whatever to the welfare of the people, but filled the churches with the parafites and bottlecompanions of the rich and great; and becaufe they juftify card-playing, dancing, and theatrical amufements, we cannot, we will not," fays our preacher, "hold connexion with them."

From this mode of reafoning, it might be fuppoled, he had found fomething new, and till 1784, had never difcovered, that there was an union between the -church and flate; that all bifhops, except the bifhop of Man, are lords of parliament; that the primate of all England Vol. II. is conftantly of the privy council; and that the crown is the fountain of preferment, as well ecclefiaftical as civil! One would fuppofe too, he had never before heard, that fome of the clergy play at cards, and that others of them, now and then, attend the theatre and other places of amufement!

But, to fpeak ferioufly, we have never heard, from any good authority, and we are convinced, there is no reafon to fuppofe, that the clergy are at this moment more immoral in their deportment, or lefs fcriptural in their doctrines, than they were many years ago, when the queftion of feparation was first agitated in the conference, and when Mr Wefley published a pamphlet, to shew that no argument, taken from the immorality of the clergy, was fufficient to authorife a feparation; and that fuch, a Teparation was improper, and had nowarrant, either from feripture or reafon. We fhall be glad to learn how this gentleman proves, that the clergy are more triffing and licentious than they formerly were; and why he did not publicly declare himfelf on this fubject, before he croffed the Atlantic, and print a fermon in England, declaring, as openly as he did in America, that he renounced a church, fo univerfally corrupt !

It is faid, "it had long been the defire of the majority of the preachers and people to feparate, but that they fubmitted to Mr Wefley's fuperior judgment, who, till the revolution, doubted the propriety of the ftep." But how fhall we reconcile this with what is granted in the fame fermon? "The preachers in general conftantly exhorted the people to attend the fervice of the church of England, from a full perfuasion, drawn from experience, that we had no alternative left, to preferve our fociety, but an adherence to the church of England (which was totally deflitute of real difcipline) or a formation of ourfelves into an independent church." Now, if the majority of the preachers withed for a feparation, how could they reconcile it to their confciences, to exhort their hearers to attend the fervice of the church? If they did fo, while, at the fame time, they defired to feparate, they were guilty of the most egregious duplicity: and if they had not in general fuch a defire, the affertion that they had, is too unguarded.

As for any change of fentiment, faid to be produced in Mr Wefley by the revolution, we hope, in this cafe, he is mifreprefented. That fuch an event muft produce a change in civil policy, we can eafily conceive; but that it could influence a judicious and pious individual, much. lefs, many thoulands of perfons, in re2 folving on a feparation from a church, of which, till that moment they had profeffed themfelves members, we cannot understand. If the church was fo corrupt, as the is reprefented in this fermon, we should suppose, that a confcientious man, under the influence of fuch a perfuafion, would either have withdrawn as foon as he perceived it, or have continued in her communion, till a more großand general corruption fhould have obliged him to retire. There is in one of the Reviews an observation to this effect: "A diffenter out of the church is more respectable than a different in it." The maxim is a good one; and we will add another : the prefervation of a fociety, at the expence of fincerity, is too dear as purchafe.

From the writings and profeffions of: Mr Wefley, during thirty or forty years, from his known predilection for the ehurch of England; and above all, fromhis own declarations, it is certain, that: the fleps taken toward a feparation were: in fome degree involuntary. He often: faid, that he was "forced into them;" which will appear the more probable; from feveral remarks in his fermons, publifhed fo lately as 1788.

Speaking of the methodists, he fays,. "they cannot, they dare not, they will: not feparate from it (the church) while they can remain therein with a clear conficience. It is true, if any finful terms of communion were imposed upon them, then they would be constrained to sepatate: but as this is not the case at prefent, we rejoice to continue therein. If it be faid, God could have made them a feparate people, like the moravian brethren, I anfwer, this would have been a direct contradiction to his whole defign in raifing them up; namely, to fpread foriptural religion throughout the land, among people of every denomination, leaving every one to hold his own opinions, and to follow his own mode ofworfhip."

The following paffage, though we fuppose he meant it of his own fociety, is applicable to the fame purpose: "I have spoken the more explicitly on this head, because so many of those, who profess much religion, have not the least conception of this matter, nor imagine such a separation to be any fin at all. They leave a christian society with assonuch unconcern, as they go out of one room into another. They give occasion to all this complicated mischief, and wipe their mouth, and fay, they have done no evil."

We have only to add, that fome time before his death, Mr Welley repented of the fteps he had taken, and did all he could to counteract what he too plainly perceived, an increasing tendency toward 3 final feparation from the church.
