

Socinianism Unscriptural The Second Part of a Vindication of Christ's Divinity

John Fletcher

Birmingham, 1791

Preface by the editor . . . iii

Letter II. To Dr. Priestley, proving that our first parents expected a Divine Messiah, and that the Divine person who appeared to the patriarchs was Christ in his pre-existent state . . . 13

Letter III. The same subject continued . . . 21

Letter IV. The three original promises concerning the Messiah, the foundation of the proofs of his divinity from the writings of the prophets . . . 27

Letter V. All the prophets exhibit Christ as the bruiser of the serpent, and the prosperous king reigning in righteousness . . . 37

Letter VI. The testimony borne by the prophets to the Godhead of Christ . . . 60

Letter VII. The evangelists and apostles attest his divinity . . . 87

Letter VIII. The same subject continued . . . 98

Letter IX. Dr. Priestley is confronted with St. Paul, and our Lord's Divine glory is seen in that apostle's writings . . . 109

In Letters to the Rev. Mr. Wesley

Joseph Benson

Letter I. The Epistle to the Romans reviewed, and sundry passages of it shown to be irreconcilable with common sense, on supposition that the author held the doctrine of Christ's mere humanity . . . 121

Letter II. The two Epistles to the Corinthians considered, and many passages of a similar nature pointed out . . . 131

Letter III. The Epistle to the Galatians, and that to the Ephesians, proved to contain a doctrine equally absurd, if Christ be a mere man . . . 143

Letter IV. The Epistle to the Philippians, and that to the Colossians, must be viewed in the same light . . . 152

Letter V. The Epistle to the Thessalonians equally inconsistent with common sense on the same supposition . . . 163

Letter VI. The Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, are also inconsistent therewith . . . 169

Letter VII. The Epistle to the Hebrews affords abundant proof of the absurdity of its doctrine, if Christ be a mere man . . . 178

Letter VIII. The Epistle of St. James, and those of St. Peter, exhibit a doctrine equally absurd, on the same supposition . . . 191

Letter IX. The Epistles of St. John, and that of St. Jude, were written in, the same strain of absurdity, if the doctrine of Christ's mere humanity be true . . . 198

Letter X. The same doctrine of Christ's mere humanity represents the apostle John as writing without common sense in the Apocalypse, and fathers similar absurdity on John the Baptist . . . 210

Letter XI. It represents Christ himself as uttering declarations absurd, and even blasphemous, and that, as well after his ascension into heaven, as during his abode on earth . . . 222
